MERGER OF DISTRICT STREET RAILWAYS

The Senate resumed consideration of the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 154 to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, if I can get back to where I was at the time I yielded, I will proceed. I think I was about to refer to holding companies in connection with the gas company in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator know that this baby of the North American Co. sells electric energy to the street-railway companies for about half a cent per kilowatt-hour, and then the other baby charges the consumers here in the District of Columbia a trifle over 4 cents per kilowatt-hour for electric energy?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; I knew that fact. I do not know whether I have brought it out or not. If I have not done so, I thank the Senator for his interruption.

HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. President, there has been a good deal of action taken, several hearings held, and some orders issued by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia in regard to the holding companies which own other companies that are supplying gas to the people of Washington.

The tortuous control of the Washington gas system by the Chase National Bank of New York is sketched as follows:

I am reading this from an article in the Washington Daily News.

The commission finds—

This is a quotation and is the finding of the commission; it is an official act; it is part of the official records of the commission of the District of Columbia:

The commission finds that the Chase National Bank is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of New York; that it controls the Chase-Harris-Forbes Corporation; that the Chase-Harris-Forbes Corporation, together with its affiliates, the United Founders Corporation and the American Founders Corporation, organized and control the Public Utility Holding Corporation of America; and that the Public Utility Holding Corporation owns 51 per cent and more of the stock and controls the Central Public Service Co.

The Central Public Service Co. owns and controls the Central Public Service Corporation, which controls the Southern Cities Public Service Corporation, the Public Service Engineering Co., the Safety Engineering & Management Co., the Utility Engineering Corporation, Federated Utilities (Inc.), and the Central Gas & Electric Corporation.

Federated Utilities (Inc.) controls, through a certain defaulted note for $13,725,000, the Westfield Trust. The sole beneficiary of the Westfield Trust is Albert E. Peirce, president of the Central Public Service Co., Central Public Service Corporation, Federated Utilities, Southern Cities Public Service, and numerous other subsidiaries of Central Public Service.

I wonder if any ordinary person will be able to follow that maze of ownership and control of one corporation by another which in turn is controlled by another, and that by another, and so on, until the one at the top is found to control a great number of subsidiaries? But we have not as yet reached the end.

The Westfield Trust owns all of the 171,188 shares of beneficial interest of Washington & Suburban Cos., which owns directly 109,196 shares of the common stock of the Washington Gas Light Co., constituting 84 per cent of the total common stock of that company.

The Southern Cities Public Service Co., a 100 per cent owned and controlled subsidiary of Central Public Service, owns and controls 70,000 shares, constituting all of the preferred shares of Washington & Suburban Cos.

The Washington—

WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT CO.

I am not quoting from the report now, but from the article—

Washington Gas stock was divided between five banking concerns which in April, 1929, entered into an agreement with Central Public Service whereby the latter agreed within two years to "find a purchaser" for the shares of Seaboard Investment Trust, organized for the specific purpose of holding the gas stock. Seaboard's name was later changed to Washington & Suburban Cos.

This is how they purchase, often, some outlying corporations which supply gas to various localities. For instance, the purchase of the Alexandria, Va., and Hyattsville, Md., gas systems are described, together with the posting of 20,000 shares of Washington Gas Light stock in the Riggs National Bank here as security for a loan of $1,000,000 for the Alexandria company. The meager information for the superstructure of holding companies is described as follows:

The said notes and preferred stock require $810,000 per annum in fixed charges and the income of the Washington & Suburban Co. in dividends from all of its holdings does not exceed $450,000, of which $392,371.20 represents dividends from the Washington Gas Light Co.

There is no revenue available to the Westfield Trust for payment of interest on its outstanding obligations, including the $6,000,000 collateral trust note, the $945,650 Washington & Suburban Gas. Co. note, and the $13,725,000 note issued by Westfield Trust for funds received by A. E. Peirce. All of the obligations of the Westfield Trust are in default.

And here is a quotation from the report again. What I have been reading recently is also a quotation from the report:

All of the efforts at management by the Chase-Harris-Forbes Corporation and its affiliates and subsidiaries, including the Central Public Service Corporation, are detrimental and harmful to the Washington Gas Light Co. and increase the costs thereof.

This is still from the report, an official document:

None of the parties hereinbefore enumerated has ever assisted in the financing of the Washington Gas Light Co. The Chase-Harris-Forbes Corporation, through its agents, affiliates, and subsidiaries, has controlled the capital stock of the Washington Gas Light Co. in such a manner that the annual meeting of the stockholders of the said corporation has been successfully continued from January, 1931, and that the said meeting has not yet taken place. All of these exercises of direct management and control were without the consent and without the knowledge of the trustees of Washington & Suburban Cos., and were merely subject to pro forma ratification by the said trustees.

Mr. President, that is right within sight of the dome of the Capitol. Some of the gas comes into the Capitol. It goes into practically every home in the District of Columbia through this maze of corporations, one owning the other, often without the investment of a penny of money, all oiled, all paid for by the consumers of gas in the District of Columbia; and here is the official report of a commission organized under a law of Congress, calling attention to the fact that the people of this Capital City are at the mercy of these corporations.

No one, without months of study, can possibly trace the ownership from one corporation to the other by affiliates, by subsidiaries, by banking corporations, all oiled, all kept in running order by the consumer, as shown in this official report.

Such, Mr. President, is an example of holding companies in the Capital City of the United States.

Mr. President, the method in which holding companies control the necessaries of life in the Capital City of Washington has attracted attention all over the country. Several years ago I made a study of the growth of the Washington Gas Light Co. I traced it from its birth, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show where I exposed that growth and showed that this company has grown out of almost nothing as far as investment is concerned. There was one time in its history when it had reached a capitalization of $2,600,000, when the gas company issued certificates of indebtedness to its own stockholders for $2,600,000, the exact amount of the capital stock outstanding. Every stockholder got a certificate of indebtedness, drawing 6 per cent interest, for an amount equal to the stock he held. He continued to draw dividends on his stock; he continued to draw 6 per cent on his certificate of indebtedness; and not one penny was ever paid for any of these certificates of indebtedness. In other words, they issued notes amounting to $2,600,000 to their own stockholders without getting a cent for them. Then, after several years, the board of directors took up these certificates of indebtedness and issued to the people who held them stock in the corporation equal to the face value of the certificates which the holder owned; thus, by that operation doubling the stock of the corporation without anybody's investing a single penny. Now, it has grown to such dimensions as I have shown by these various holding companies, covering and including a great many corporations outside of the District, headed by the Chase National Bank in the city of New York.

As I said, this has attracted some attention; and I have in my hand now a very able editorial printed in West Virginia, in the Wheeling Intelligencer, on May 17, 1932, in which, away out in West Virginia, the editorial writer very ably shows what a disgrace it is that in the Capital of the United States such things can go on unmolested and uninterfered with. They pay but little attention to the action of the Public Service Commission. They ignore the law which provides that the ownership of this corporation must always remain in the District of Columbia. They avoid it in one way and another. They defy the acts of Congress in carrying out the various schemes to rob the consumers of this necessary of life by charging them an exorbitant price, because they have no other income. That is the source of all their income.

I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert as a part of my remarks, without reading, the editorial to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer of May 17, 1932]

THE HOLDING COMPANY OUTRAGE

Elsewhere in this issue the Intelligencer presents a chart which tells graphically the story of the holding company outrage in the United States.

Starting with a few small gas and light concerns, we see this pyramid rise tier upon tier, each step representing new financing, new stock issues, new injections of water, new profits for the organizer, new millions of rate base for the consuming public to pay returns upon.

In this particular case the manipulators started out with three modest utilities—the Rosslyn Gas Light Co., the Georgetown Gas Light Co., of Montgomery County, and the Washington Gas Light Co., of Montgomery County. The first two were merged into the Georgetown Gas Light Co., and subsequently with the third formed the Washington Gas Light Co.

There the uninitiated might expect the process to stop. A compact holding company, controlling much of the gas and light business in the Washington area, had been established and was functioning. But the promoters were only starting. They had pocketed a fat profit from each consolidation, had arranged attractive service contracts, had puffed up the rate base in each instance, and were enjoying their experience immensely. Accordingly, they lumped the Alexandria Gas Co., the Washington Suburban Gas Co., the New York & Richmond Gas Co., put them together with the Washington Gas Light Co. and created the Washington and Suburban Companies. These, together with some six millions of collateral trust notes and other investments, found their way into ownership of the Westfield Trust Co.

Surely the time had come to call a halt. Westfield control had been established; the holding company idea had been developed to an extreme degree. But the financial manipulators were just getting warmed up. In rapid and bewildering succession we find control moving to Federal Utilities (Inc.), the Patuxent Gas Co., and the Central Gas & Electric Co. Then the whole, tossed in with the Utility Engineering Corporation, Safety Engineering & Management Co., Public Service Engineering Co., and Southern Cities Public Service Co., moving into the Central Public Service Corporation.

Even here the merging process was in but its early stages. Fifteen or twenty transactions had been completed. Unearned profits had been extracted from each. The investing public was being taken for a financial ride and the consuming public robbed systematically through artificially enlarged rate bases. But there still was big business ahead.

Further negotiations brought control into the Central Public Service Co., from where new expansions were undertaken, involving the United States & Overseas Corporation, and the Public Utilities Holding Corporation of America, which branched into the American Founders' Corporation, Chase-Harris-Forbes Corporation, the Harris-Forbes Trust Co., and the Harris Trust & Savings Bank. These led, in the final step, to the great Chase National Bank.

Of all the organizations represented in this financial maze, only eight at the bottom are operating companies, hence revenue producers. All of the others are holding companies of one type or another, except the three engineering companies, through which exorbitant and unnecessary charges were originally imposed for services.

How many millions in unearned profits were taken in the course of these various organizing steps, how much has been added to the gas and light bills of the people of Washington and vicinity because of fictitious values, how much has been lost by the purchasers of watered stock still are matters of speculation. That the public looting has reached tremendous proportions, however, is not to be doubted.

What is true of Washington Gas & Light control is true of almost every operating utility in the United States. The piling of holding company upon holding company, the imposition of ruinous charges for management, for financing, etc., the constant taking of unearned organizing profits, the imposition of higher and higher rates through the creation of fictitious "valuations" have reduced the utility situation to the point where one of but two solutions is possible:

Either this entire holding-company structure must be torn down and the financing profiteers driven out, or

The people of the United States must take over the utilities and operate them themselves.

MIDWEST UTILITIES CO.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a little further on holding companies. I want to take up now the Midwest Utilities Co., one that has recently failed, the Insull company. I had the data in my possession yesterday, but I could not get them when I was talking about Mr. Insull. I want to give you an idea of something of his companies.

When Mr. Insull sat at the top of the world, on the pyramid, and controlled States and attempted to control even the Senate of the United States by buying a seat here for one of his favorites, as I remember—and I am speaking from memory; I may be wrong—he was a member of the board of directors of 85 utility corporations. He was chairman of the board of directors, I think, of 50 or 60, probably more than that, and he was the president of the corporation itself in 11 of these instances.

The Midwest Utilities Co. had 12 principal subsidiary companies, and many of these subsidiary companies had other subsidiary companies, and those subsidiary companies had still other subsidiary companies. The Midwest Utilities Co. was the father, and from its various offspring from time to time there were born children, and they grew up, became big and monstrous, and had children of their own, until the Midwest Utilities Co. was a great-great-great-great-grandfather.

The principal 12 were the following:

The Central & Southwest Utilities Co. Now, let us stop right there. That is the first one. The Central & Southwest Utilities Co. had the following children: The American Public Service Co., the Central Power & Light Co., the Public Service Co. of Oklahoma, the Southwestern Gas & Electric Co., the Southwestern Securities Co., whose subsidiary is the Southwestern Light & Power Co.; so that the first subsidiary had five children of its own.

Let us keep right on there. The American Public Service Co., one of these grandchildren of the Midwest Utilities Co., had another subsidiary, the West Texas Utilities Co. That gets through with one of the subsidiaries.

The next one is the Central Illinois Public Service Co.

The third is the Central Power Co.

The fourth is the Commonwealth Light & Power Co., and the Commonwealth Light & Power Co. had one child of its own. The Commonwealth Light & Power Co. had one immediate subsidiary company, the Inland Power & Light Co.; but the Inland Power & Light Co. was not childless itself. It was a married man, and it had some children of its own. The Inland Power & Light Co. had six children. One was the Arkansas-Missouri Power Co. Another child was the Kansas Power Co. Another child was the Michigan Public Service Co. Another child was the Missouri Edison Co. Another child was the Missouri Public Service Co., and still another was the Dalhart Public Service Co. Of these great-great-grandchildren, one of them, the Arkansas-Missouri Power Co., owned the East Missouri Power Co.

We have hardly started in this enumeration of the children and the grandchildren. We have gotten down now to the fifth generation, and they are still having children.

Mr. LEWIS. Legitimate issue?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator asks if they were legitimate. I do not think the father to begin with was legitimate. They started with an illegitimate parentage.

There is no excuse whatever for these corporations owned and owned and owned down the line. What would some one getting electricity, let us say, from the East Missouri Power Co. do if he wanted to find out who really owned the company? He would go, first, to the Arkansas & Missouri Power Co., and from the Arkansas & Missouri Power Co. to another corporation, and then go on to another one, and then he would have reached the Commonwealth Light & Power Co., and that is the child of the Midwest Utilities Co.; so you are back to the beginning.

Let us read some more of these. These are the direct subsidiaries, the children of the first generation, of the Midwest Utilities Co.; the Illinois Northern Utilities Co. It is important to remember the names, because one word may make all the difference in the world in the corporation. Another one is the Kansas Electric Power Co. Another one is the Kentucky Utilities Co.

Let us see about the Kentucky Utilities Co. The Kentucky Utilities Co. on December 31, 1930, had four children. I do not know whether there have been any born since or not.

Eighth comes the Michigan Gas & Electric Co., ninth the Missouri Gas & Electric Service Co., tenth the National Electric Power Co.; and the National Electric Power Co. has five children, first, the Michigan Electric Power Co., the National Public Service Corporation, the New England Public Service Co., the Ohio Electric Power Co., and the Penn Central Light & Power Co.

Some of these have children of their own. Of the subsidiaries, the National Public Service Corporation has three children. They are the Jersey Central Power & Light Co., the Municipal Service Co., and Seaboard Public Service Co.

That is not all. The Seaboard Public Service Co. is a full-grown institution and has children of its own. The Seaboard Public Service Co. has five children. They are as follows: The Eastern Shore Public Service Co., the Florida Power Corporation, the Georgia Power & Light Co., the Tidewater Power Co., and the Virginia Public Service Co.

I will go back again to the children of the first generation of the Midwest Utilities Co. I have called attention to 10 of them. The eleventh is the Northwest Utilities Co., and the twelfth is the United Public Service Co.

The New England Public Service Co., which is a child of the third or fourth generation, being a subsidiary of the National Electric Power Co., has some children of its own also. The subsidiary—the New England Public Service Co.—has five children, one of which is the National Light, Heat, & Power Co. We are a good ways from the parent now, but we are not as far as we will have to get if we trace it through. This New England Co., in the fifth generation, has five children, one of which is the National Light, Heat & Power Co., and it has one child, The Twin State Gas & Electric Co.

UNITED PUBLIC SERVICE CO.

The principal subsidiary, the United Public Service Co., has two children, and each of its children has, in turn, other children, the sub-sub-subsidiaries, the Kentucky Power Co. (Inc.), controlling the Kentucky Power & Light Co., and the United Public Utilities controlling 21 sub-sub-subsidiaries, as follows. Here we are away down in the fourth or fifth generation.

We find one of these corporations with 21 children—9 electric, 6 gas, and 6 ice and coal. They are as follows:

Alabama United Ice Co., Bradford & Gettysburg Electric Light & Power Co., Brookville & Lewisburg Lighting Co., The Buckeye Light & Power Co., Cap. F. Bourland Ice Co., Citizens Heat, Light & Power Co., The Eaton Lighting Co., Fort Smith Gas Co., Georgia United Ice Co., Greenville Electric Light & Power Co., Indiana Ohio Public Service Co., Knife River Coal Mining Co., Louisiana Ice & Coal Co., The Lynn Natural Gas Co., New Madison Lighting Co., North Dakota Power & Light Co., Northern Power & Light Co., The Peoples Service Co., Southern Gas Producing Co., Texas Ice & Refrigerating Co., and the Western Ohio Public Service Co.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I understand it, after they get down to about the fifth generation, we find a litter.

Mr. NORRIS. With some of them.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator familiar with the saying we get from the late Victor Hugo, that in a litter of wolves there is occasionally one dog born which is immediately devoured by the mother of the litter for fear the dog might eat up its brothers and sisters?

ACTIVITIES OF THE POWER TRUST

Mr. NORRIS. That reference makes me think of what the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission showed a year or two ago, on a subject which I was not discussing, but which is fresh in my mind. I discussed it at length a year or two ago in the Senate.

It was disclosed that in their desire to control the sentiment of the United States, and control everything from school district to White House, they undertook to buy a lot of newspapers, and did buy a lot of newspapers. They had traveling men on the road, buying newspapers, and by reason of these subsidiaries and these sub-subsidiaries, these traveling men going from different companies got mixed up, and in one case down in South Carolina, or in North Carolina, the traveling man representing one corporation, trying to buy a newspaper, came in competition with the children of his father. There were so many of them scattered around over the country that they did not have any more worlds to conquer, and they commenced to conquer themselves, they commenced to eat themselves up. They got into competition, these two men to whom I have referred, representing in reality the same outfit, bidding against each other to buy a newspaper. They always paid a great deal more than the newspapers were worth. Money was not an object, because it was not their money; it was the money of the little fellow who has an electric light; it was the money of the washerwoman; it was the money of the taxpayer who has an electric light on the street corner. It was their money. So it was a very easy matter to spend money. It was unlimited. It is like one corporation commencing to eat another, and starting at the tail, while the corporation it was eating would commence to eat the tail of the corporation that was eating it. There was no limit to it. I am wondering, Mr. President, how long the American people are going to stand for that kind of business.

TAX UPON USERS OF ELECTRICITY

The Senate passed a tax bill some time ago, and as that bill passed the Senate we put in an amendment, introduced by my colleague [Mr. HOWELL], levying a very light tax upon these big corporations which are generating electricity. It was the belief of the introducer, it was the theory of the Senate when it adopted the amendment, that the amount was so small that as a practical proposition it would be impossible for the power company to pass on the cost to the consumer, because in every case, among other things, they would have to get the consent of the commission in the State where they were located before they would be allowed to increase their rates.

It will be remembered that in that condition the bill went to conference, and when it came back from the conference committee that provision was stricken out, and in lieu of it was language providing for a direct tax upon the consumer of electricity. One of the things creditable about it was that there was no deception in it. On its face it was a tax upon every home in the United States which uses electricity; it was a tax upon the owner of every country store which uses electricity, a direct tax.

There was quite a contest over it. It never yet has been defended anywhere. Although it was viciously assailed on the floor of the Senate, it never was defended by the conferees.

In the course of the debate, when I had the floor, I was interrupted by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who said:

> I want to observe, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, in connection with his suggestion as to the efficiency of the conferees on the part of the Senate, that I noted this morning in the press a statement from Congressman CRISP, to whom was attributed the responsibility for placing the burden of the power tax on the consumers. I would like to read it for the benefit of the Senate, assuming, of course, that he is correctly reported.

Then he read:

> "When the conferees reached the tax on the electricity item Senator SMOOT stated that it was confiscatory and that it would bankrupt certain public-utility companies in Utah. A majority of the Senate conferees said the item was impossible. After discussion and in the nature of a compromise, I suggested a retail tax on electric energy."

That is the end of the newspaper quotation which the Senator from Indiana read. Then he said:

> The interesting part of that statement, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit the further observation, is this line, and it comes from Mr. CRISP, according to the paper:
> "A majority of the Senate conferees"—
> That would be three—
> "A majority of the Senate conferees said the item was impossible."
> That was after a majority in this body had said that it was not only not impossible but that it was correctly and properly to be levied against the vendor. But a majority of the Senate conferees, three out of five, decided that a majority of the Senate was all wrong in the matter, and therefore they would just switch it around completely and add the burden of this tax to the already overburdened back of the taxpaying consumers of the country.

Those are the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. It will be noted that in the newspaper article from which he quoted, it was stated that it was said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that this tax as the Senate had it would bankrupt certain public-utility companies in Utah.

Mr. President, it will be interesting to take up some of the public utilities in Utah and see just how they are built up in their superstructure. It is interesting not only because it shows that the method which I have outlined as being followed in other localities in the United States is being practiced in Utah just the same but it is likewise interesting to show that those public-utility corporations in Utah were making more money than they ought to have been allowed to make, or to keep.

UTAH LIGHT & POWER CO.

Let us see something about the public-utility corporations in Utah. The Utah Light & Power Co. is one of them. Let us trace it just a little. It is the Power Trust representative in the State of Utah, or one of them.

The properties, or securities representing their control, that were eventually consolidated for operation as the Utah Power & Light Co. came into control of the Electric Bond & Share Co. about June or July, 1912, as the managing director of a syndicate consisting of Electric Bond & Share Co.; Charles Hayden, of Hayden, Stone & Co.; James Campbell, of St. Louis, Mo.; and Joseph R. Nutt, of Cleveland, Ohio. Let me see! That name sounds familiar. Who is Joseph R. Nutt? Why, Mr. President, he is the treasurer of the Republican National Committee, having for his principal job the reelection of Herbert Hoover as President of the United States. He was one of the syndicate, so the investigation before the Federal Trade Commission discloses.

The properties involved are in the States of Utah, Idaho, Colorado, and Wyoming. Electric Bond & Share Co., as the managing director of the syndicate, caused three new companies to be organized in 1912 and one in 1913. The companies were as follows:

POWER COMPANY ACTIVITIES IN UTAH

Utah Power & Light Co., organized to become an operating and subholding company, owning and operating, either directly or through its subsidiary, the Western Colorado Power Co., the properties controlled by the syndicate. The Utah Power & Light Co. was incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine. That is interesting—doing business in Utah and incorporated in Maine. It was incorporated on the 6th day of September, 1912, but did not begin to function as a going concern until December 6, 1912, on which date the first actual transfer of properties to it was completed. Between September 6 and December 6, 1912, the properties controlled by the syndicate were being used as the basis for financing two other companies, namely, Utah Power Co. and Utah Securities Corporation. Notice the similarity in names, but not referring to the same corporation. Here is the Utah Power & Light Co. The one I am speaking of now, the Utah Power Co., is a different corporation, and the Utah Securities Corporation is still a different one.

Utah Power Co. was incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine on September 6, 1912, the same day on which the Utah Power & Light Co. was incorporated. The principal function performed by the Utah Power Co. was to serve as an intermediary through which properties and securities were transferred from the syndicate to the Utah Power & Light Co. and at prices in face values of securities far in excess of their cost to the Electric Bond & Share Co. as managing director of the syndicate.

Utah Power Co. was made a subsidiary of Utah Power & Light Co. Since the completion of the consolidation in 1912 the principal function of the Utah Power Co. has been to hold the contract under which Phoenix Utility Co.—there is another corporation coming in now—formerly the Phoenix Construction Co., an incorporated construction department of the Electric Bond & Share Co., another subsidiary from the same parentage exactly, has built and reconstructed properties of the Utah Power & Light Co. The Utah Power Co. has been relatively inactive since 1922.

Following the consolidation the Western Colorado Power Co. was organized as an operating company subsidiary to the Utah Power & Light Co. All properties in Colorado that were owned or controlled by Utah Power & Light Co. were transferred to the Western Colorado Power Co. for operation in 1913.

The Utah Securities Corporation was organized to act as a holding company controlling the Utah Power & Light Co. and its subsidiaries, the Utah Power Co. and the Western Colorado Power Co.

Utah Securities Corporation was incorporated under the laws of Virginia on September 10, 1912. It acquired control of Utah Power & Light Co. by 100 per cent common-stock ownership, except directors' qualifying shares, in 1912, and continued to control it by 100 per cent ownership until 1925, when the control was passed on intact to the Electric Power & Light Corporation, successor by reorganization to Utah Securities Corporation. Electric Power & Light Corporation still continues to control the Utah Power & Light Co. by 100 per cent ownership of the latter's common stock.

I now come to an outline of the steps in the consolidation. By the first step part of the properties and securities controlled by the syndicate were transferred to the Utah Power Co. These properties cost Electric Bond & Share Co. or the syndicate $2,975,091.35. For them the Utah Power Co. issued to the Electric Bond & Share Co. securities to the amount of $8,498,200, representing a pumping into the stock of water, pure water, to the extent of $5,523,108.35 over their cash cost. That is one of the great power companies which it was said is going to be injured and killed unless this tax, the light tax the Senate put on, was taken off and put upon the already overburdened shoulders of the consumer.

The securities given by the Utah Power & Light Co. represented all the securities it had outstanding except 18 directors' qualifying shares, and consisted of 1-year 6 per cent gold notes, $2,500,000; 10,000 shares of 7 per cent preferred stock, $1,000,000; and 49,982 shares of $100 par value common stock, $4,998,200.

By the second step $8,498,200 of securities issued by the Utah Power Co. to the Electric Bond & Share Co. were combined with other securities controlled by the syndicate to form a basket that was transferred on the next day, September 26, 1912, to Utah Securities Corporation. The total cash cost of the basket to the Electric Bond & Share Co. was $4,950,000. In the transfer the basket was divided into two parts, the first part consisting of all securities in the basket except $4,498,200 aggregate par value of Utah Power Co. common stock, and the second part consisting of $4,498,200 par value of Utah Power common stock. For the first part of the basket Utah Securities Corporation paid $4,950,000 in cash, representing the total cash cost of the basket, and for the second part Utah Securities Corporation issued $27,499,000 aggregate par value of its common stock. Since the $4,950,000 paid in cash represented the total cash cost of the basket, the $27,499,000 par value of common stock of Utah Securities Corporation was acquired by the Electric Bond & Share Co. (or the syndicate) without the expenditure of one cent. In other words, it was all water, $27,499,000, and yet we are told on the floor of the Senate that the conferees met the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who said, "If you put a tax upon these corporations, it will ruin this great company in Utah."

To obtain the cash with which to pay $4,950,000 for the basket and for further acquisitions, Utah Securities Co. pledged the securities included in the basket and pledged the securities to be obtained in the future under a collateral trust agreement as security for the issuance of $25,000,000 of 6 per cent gold notes. Thus the cash with which to pay for the basket and for other purposes was obtained by the sale of bonds secured by the properties and securities contained in the basket and the pledge to add other securities to the collateral pledged as they were acquired.

Later, on October 31, 1912, an additional $2,500,000 of 6 per cent notes and $2,500,000 par value of common stock were issued by Utah Securities Corporation to the Electric Bond & Share Co. to be sold to obtain cash with which to pay for another basket of securities, making the total face value of 6 per cent notes outstanding $27,500,000 and of common stock $30,000,000, all issued to Electric Bond & Share Co. The cash price paid for this basket was its cost price to the Electric Bond & Share Co. Electric Bond & Share Co. found purchasers for the total of $27,500,000 in notes and gave a like amount, $27,500,000, par value of Utah Securities Corporation common stock to their purchasers.

This distribution of the common stock as a bonus left in the hands of the Electric Bond & Share Co. $2,500,000 par value of common stock of Utah Securities Corporation, which was shared with other members of the syndicate as part payment for their risk and services as promoters of reorganization. Do not forget the syndicate. Do not forget that at the beginning of this explanation of what happened in Utah I named the syndicate.

The Electric Bond & Share Co. itself purchased $3,220,000 face value of the notes. With them was received as a bonus $3,220,000 par value of Utah Securities Corporation common stock. They also retained $987,500 par value of the $2,500,000, which was divided with other members of the syndicate. They also received $201,900 in cash commissions for the sale of the 6 per cent notes, making their total promoters' profit in cash on the par value of the common stock $4,409,400.

That illustrates, Mr. President, how these holding companies bleed the subordinate subsidiary companies. It shows they are charging a commission and they are getting cash for doing something for themselves in reality. They do something for themselves, charge a commission for it, and the poor consumer of electricity has to pay. But when we come with a proposition to tax these great corporations that are indulging in this kind of financial murder we are told that it can not be done without ruining some of these great corporations in Utah.

Now let us get a general survey of what happened in Utah. Let us see just how much water was put into this business; let us review it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator on condition that it be understood that I do not lose the floor and that the conference report which I understand the Senator desires now to have considered will not take up any material amount of time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am authorized to submit a conference report, representing a unanimous agreement, signed by both the House and the Senate conferees on a very short bill having reference to loans for farmers in cultivating as well as producing crops.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think we had better defer the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. KING. We have a street railway merger bill pending, and I do not want that to be superseded.

Mr. FLETCHER. The report will occupy but a minute.

Mr. KING. It might consume more time. I think it will require some debate, and therefore I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Now let us review what happened with these companies which can not afford to pay a tax to the Federal Government.

At the end of the financing of the Utah Securities Corporation control of the properties and securities originally controlled by the syndicate had been transferred to Utah Securities Corporation. On December 6 the first transfer of these properties and securities to Utah Power & Light Co. occurred. On that date the physical properties of the Telluride Power Co., acquired by Utah Securities Corporation at receivership sale at a cost of $6,480,708.32, were transferred to the Utah Power & Light Co. which wrote them on its fixed property account at $22,100,000.

That is a nice bit of water pumped into this concern overnight. They bought the property for $6,480,708.32, and the next day it was worth $22,100,000; and that is one of the power corporations that can not afford to pay the tax the Senate proposed to levy upon it. This represented a write-up which means water of $15,619,291.68. More than fifteen and one-half million dollars of water pumped into that capitalization overnight; and the poor people of Utah, Colorado, and the other States that are paying the bill have to stand it all. The corporations are converting water into gold by this process; and yet we are told that we must not tax them, because they can not stand it; and therefore we must levy the tax upon the poor consumer who is now paying the revenue on all of this water.

In the other case that I mentioned a while ago there was $27,000,000 of water, now nearly $16,000,000 is added to it out in Utah. I do not know whether in Utah, as I said a while ago, it is pure water; perhaps it is salt water; perhaps it is taken out of the Great Salt Lake, and that may be one of the reasons why the Great Salt Lake has been receding for the last several years and getting smaller and smaller all the time.

Subsequent acquisitions, including both properties acquired by purchase and properties constructed by Phoenix Utility Co., or its predecessor, the Phoenix Construction Co., which was the incorporated construction department of Electric Bond & Share Co., were similarly written up on the fixed capital account of the Utah Power & Light Co. at prices $9,610,828.49 in excess of their cash cost to Utah Securities Corporation, making the total write up in fixed capital $25,230,120.17.

That ought to buy a whole lot of water which the consumers have converted into gold and are now paying returns on; and yet we dare not tax these great concerns.

Not all assets acquired by the Utah Power & Light Co. at prices in excess of their cash cost to affiliated interests were of such a nature as to be chargeable to fixed capital account. Consequently not all of the inflation in its accounts was included in the $25,230,120.17 of inflation in fixed capital. The total amount of inflation established was $34,330,246.

Over $34,000,000 of water, over $34,000,000 of air converted into capital stock, converted into assets upon which the consumers of electricity in those Western States must pay a return through all eternity.

As of December 31, 1930, this total inflation of $34,330,246 was equal to all of the book value of the common stock outstanding, amounting to $30,000,000, all of which was owned by Electric Power & Light Corporation, and to $4,330,246, or 16.8 per cent, of the total book value of the preferred stock outstanding. In previous years, when the total of the preferred stock outstanding was less, the percentage thereof represented by inflation was correspondingly greater.

The Electric Power & Light Corporation has no cash investment in the common stock of the Utah Power & Light Co. except accumulated earnings to the amount of $4,979,474, left in the business as a surplus. Yet it received—remember, it has no cash investment in the common stock of the Utah Light & Power Co. except those accumulated earnings of less than $5,000,000—yet it received in cash dividends thereon $6,150,000 from 1925 to 1930, inclusive. In other words, it got over $1,220,000 more in dividends in five years than its entire investment in the property; it received $6,150,000 in cash dividends on the $30,000,000 of common stock, all of which was water when issued.

We must not tax a corporation like that! Oh, we must take the tax off that power concern and put it on the poor fellow in his humble home, upon the laborer, upon the small business man, scatter it over, and make the consumers pay it! They have been paying it for years; they are used to it. Add this additional burden to the one who is already overburdened, but, for God's sake, do not touch the corporation that is getting over $6,000,000 out of an investment of nothing on earth but water!

In addition the Electric Bond & Share Co. received $201,900 in cash commission on the sale of bonds of Utah Securities Corporation and fees in cash paid to Electric Bond & Share Co. and its incorporated construction department, Phoenix Utility Co., to the amount of $2,974,029 from 1912 to 1930, inclusive. They received in dividends in five years $6,150,000 without the investment of a single cent of cash and in addition got nearly $3,000,000 in fees from 1912 to 1930.

These samples of financing are enough to show that if the Utah Co. were threatened with bankruptcy the draining off of money by its controlling interests would be responsible. But it appears that, even with this manipulation of the operating company for all the direct and indirect profits it can be made to produce, the Utah Co. has had big profits left.

In 1930 the power companies generally had a very good year, both their gross earnings and their net earnings increasing. The Utah Co. had a rate of return on its fixed capital which was something over 10 per cent. This comes from the report of the Federal Trade Commission. Its earnings for the last 11 months of 1931 and the first month of 1932 I find set forth in the Electrical World of May 28, 1932, on page 931. They appear under the heading: "Earnings of operating companies dropped but little in 1931–32." The Utah Co.'s gross earnings for this 12-month period ending January 31, 1932, are shown to have dropped only 5 per cent from the previous 12-month period, which covered nearly all of 1930 and the month of January, 1931. The net earnings show a decline of 9 per cent, from $6,117,744 to $5,555,986.

A footnote to the table in which these figures are given points out that "net earnings are gross earnings, less taxes, operating and maintenance expenses."

I wonder if the Senator from Utah will tell us where he finds in this any evidence of impending bankruptcy. Does this evidence tend to show that the great Utah Co. is so poor that it can not and could not have paid the light tax that was levied on it by the United States Senate? It looks as though the only real fear of the power barons controlling these Utah properties was that their own profit might be reduced. In other words, what they were struggling against was further curtailment of the million dollars a year or more they have been taking out of the Utah Co. in dividends on common stock, which is all water, and which never cost them a single cent.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I was unavoidably called from the Chamber, but I am very anxious to get the statistics. How much was the common stock that they watered up? Did the Senator give the figures on that?

Mr. NORRIS. I did; yes. I can not point it out, but I think it was $30,000,000, all water.

Mr. LONG. How much have they paid in dividends on that watered stock?

Mr. NORRIS. I gave that, Mr. President, but I should have to look back to get the figures.

Mr. LONG. Several millions of dollars?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; a great many millions of dollars.

Now, Mr. President, I want to give the Senate some evidence taken from official sources. I am going to read and comment on an extract from Exhibit 5164 of the power and gas utilities investigation before the Federal Trade Commission (Seventieth Congress, first session) as of June 15, 1932. This refers to the Utah Power & Light Co.—the same company that can not be taxed for fear of being driven into bankruptcy.

I have already given, from other sources, a history of this company, some of which is repeated here in this official report; so, since there is some repetition in it, probably I had better ask permission to insert in the RECORD this extract from the report. It bears out all of the facts that I have narrated to the Senate. It is an official document from the Federal Trade Commission, and it is from the evidence adduced there that I have already outlined to the Senate what actually happened.

I now ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the extract from the exhibit that I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from Exhibit 5164, power and gas utilities investigation, S. Res. 83, 70th Cong., 1st sess., June 15, 1932]

SUMMARY OF REPORT ON UTAH POWER & LIGHT CO.

COMPANIES DIRECTLY INVOLVED

Utah Power & Light Co. was organized and incorporated by Electric Bond & Share Co. as managing member of a syndicate under the laws of the State of Maine on September 6, 1912. It began to function as a going concern on December 6, 1912. During the latter part of 1912 and early in 1913 Electric Bond & Share Co. in the same capacity organized three other companies, namely: Utah Power Co., on September 6, 1912, in the State of Maine; Utah Securities Corporation, on September 10, 1912, in the State of Virginia; and the Western Colorado Power Co., on March 12, 1913, in the State of Colorado.

These companies were organized by Electric Bond & Share Co. for the purpose of consolidating various electric utilities in Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, and Colorado. Utah Securities Corporation was organized as a holding company to control Utah Power & Light Co., which in the final set-up at the end of the consolidation in turn controlled Utah Power Co. and the Western Colorado Power Co.

FINANCING UTAH SECURITIES CORPORATION AND UTAH POWER CO.

On September 25, 1912, Electric Bond & Share Co. received for the account of the above-mentioned syndicate $8,498,200 in aggregate par value of the securities of Utah Power Co. in consideration for properties costing it $2,975,091.35, or an excess of $5,523,108.35. The $8,498,200 in securities of Utah Power Co. consisted of $2,500,000 in 1-year, 6 per cent notes, $1,000,000 par value of 7 per cent preferred stock, and $4,998,200 par value of common stock. The excess paid was equal to all of the common stock and more than half of the preferred stock issued.

On September 25, 1912, Electric Bond & Share Co., as managing member of this syndicate, through Harry M. Durning, intermediary, received for account of the syndicate $27,499,000 aggregate par value of the common stock of the Utah Securities Corporation, the total consideration given being the aforesaid $4,998,200 aggregate par value of the common stock of Utah Power Co. which Electric Bond & Share Co. had received as syndicate manager without cash cost. On September 25, 1912, the board of directors of Utah Securities Corporation authorized the placing of an arbitrary ledger value of $1,000,000 on the $4,998,200 par value of Utah Power Co.

On September 14, 1912, Utah Securities Corporation issued $25,000,000 principal amount of its 10-year, 6 per cent notes to a syndicate headed by Electric Bond & Share Co., and on October 31, 1912, it issued to Electric Bond & Share Co., as managing member of a syndicate, an additional $2,500,000 principal amount of its 10-year, 6 per cent notes and an additional $2,500,000 par value of its common stock, making the total of notes issued to October 31, 1912, $27,500,000, and of its common stock issued to that date, $30,000,000. In the sale of the $27,500,000 principal amount of notes, Electric Bond & Share Co. delivered to the purchasers as bonus a like amount ($27,500,000) in par value of Utah Securities Corporation common stock. The remaining $2,500,000 par value of Utah Securities Corporation common stock was "retained by Electric Bond & Share Co. in part payment for its risks and services." Electric Bond & Share Co. shared this $2,500,000 of common stock with other members of the syndicate which handled the original issue of $25,000,000 of notes on September 14, 1912. Electric Bond & Share Co. retained $987,500 of this common stock as its share of the portion not distributed as bonus with the notes.

The total financial benefit to Electric Bond & Share Co. from this financing of Utah Securities Corporation was $201,900 in cash commissions and $4,207,500 par value of common stock of Utah Securities Corporation.

On October 31, 1912, Utah Securities Corporation placed a total ledger value of $1,101,000 on the $30,000,000 aggregate par value of its common stock issued as a bonus to subscribers of its notes. In 1914 blocks of this Utah Securities Corporation common stock were sold to Sperling & Co., of London, England, at $25 a share and to Harris, Forbes & Co. at $19.25 per share.

FINANCING UTAH POWER & LIGHT CO.

In December, 1912, properties costing Utah Securities Corporation $6,480,708.32 cash, i. e., $6,460,000 at receivership sale on November 18, 1912, plus subsequent interest adjustments of $20,708.32, were written on the books of Utah Power & Light Co. on December 6, 1912, at $22,100,000, or at an excess amount over cash cost to Utah Securities Corporation of $15,619,291.68.

Subsequent acquisitions of properties from or through Utah Securities Corporation, including both properties acquired by purchase and properties constructed by affiliated interests, were charged to the fixed capital account of Utah Power & Light Co. at amounts totaling $9,610,823.49 more than their cost to Utah Securities Corporation. Thus the total inflation in the fixed capital account of Utah Power & Light Co. over cash cost of the properties to the Securities Corporation was $25,230,120.17.

Not all assets acquired by Utah Power & Light Co. at prices in excess of their cash cost to affiliated interests were of such nature as to be chargeable to fixed capital account. Consequently not all of the inflation in its accounts was included in the $25,230,120.17 of inflation in fixed capital. The total amount of inflation established is $34,330,246.

As of December 31, 1930, this total inflation of $34,330,246 was equal to all of the book value of common stock outstanding amounting to $30,000,000 (all of which was owned by Electric Power & Light Corporation) and to $4,330,246, or 16.8 per cent of the total book value of preferred stock outstanding. In previous years, when the total of preferred stock outstanding was less, the percentage thereof represented by inflation was correspondingly greater.

FEES PAID TO AFFILIATED INTERESTS

During the period of 18 years covered by the examination, namely, from 1913 to 1930, inclusive, Utah Power & Light Co. paid fees, etc., in cash to its affiliated interests as follows:

Construction fees paid to Phoenix Utility Co., 100 per cent Bond & Share, and charged to fixed-capital account of Utah Power & Light Co., amounted to $780,766.16.

Engineering fees paid to Electric Bond & Share Co. and charged to fixed capital account of Utah Power & Light Co., amounted to $316,211.96.

Supervision and service fees paid to Electric Bond & Share Co. and charged to operating expenses by Utah Power & Light Co. amounted to $1,736,913.20.

Fees paid to Electric Bond & Share Co. for issuing obligations, and charged to bond discount and expense, or organization expense accounts, which were closed out to fixed-capital account, amounted to $140,137.68.

The total amount for all fees paid during this 18-year period—1913 to 1930—was $2,974,029.

During the period from January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1922, Utah Securities Corporation paid supervision fees to Electric Bond & Share Co. in behalf of Utah Power & Light Co. and its subsidiary, the Western Colorado Power Co., to the amount of $397,322.85. The last two companies named likewise paid the same amount to Electric Bond & Share Co. for the same period, thus paying twice for the same service. Electric Bond & Share Co. carried this amount of $397,322.85 in its accounts as "suspense accounts payable" and credited interest thereon through 1923 and 1924, until the total of the account on December 31, 1924, was $440,564.81. On March 12, 1925, Electric Bond & Share Co. was finally "released" from its liability to refund this amount at the time Utah Securities Corporation was reorganized into Electric Power & Light Corporation.

DISCOUNTS, COMMISSIONS, AND PROFITS ON SALE OF SECURITIES

During 1914 and 1915 Utah Securities Corporation loaned cash to the amount of $8,155,338.21 to Utah Power Co. with which to pay for construction performed by Phoenix Construction Co. When the completed properties were transferred to Utah Power & Light Co. the latter company took up the loans by issuing $7,976,507.88 principal amount of 4 per cent notes at a price 82½ and $1,660,120, principal amount of 5 per cent notes at 95, both payable on or before August 1, 1922. The total discount amounted to $1,481,289.67. This discount was charged by Utah Power & Light Co. to its fixed capital account.

From 1917 to 1925 Utah Power & Light Co. paid Utah Securities Corporation a total of $831,200 in commissions ranging from $7 to $10 per share for "finding" a purchaser for 89,200 shares of Utah Power & Light Co.'s preferred stock. The purchaser "found" in every case was Electric Bond & Share Co. Access to records, which would show what profit was made on the sale of this preferred stock, was refused by Electric Bond & Share Co., this matter being involved in pending litigation.

By a readjustment in Utah Power & Light Co.'s capitalization made in 1913 at the instance of Utah Securities Corporation, the latter company surrendered $4,500,000 face value of 6 per cent gold notes and $2,837,000 par value of Utah Power & Light Co.'s common stock, and received in lieu thereof $3,000,000 par value of 7 per cent preferred stock and $4,331,000 par value of 6 per cent second preferred stock. The financial benefit to Utah Securities Corporation from this readjustment for the year 1913 was the difference between the interest on the 6 per cent notes surrendered and the dividends on 6 per cent and 7 per cent preferred stock received. This profit amounted to $200,220 for the year 1913. Beginning with January 1, 1914, the dividend rate on the 6 per cent preferred stock was increased to 7 per cent, making the total profit to Utah Securities Corporation for 1914 and each succeeding year during which it continued to hold the preferred stock $243,590.

In 1927 all common and preferred stock of Utah Power & Light Co. was changed from par to no par stock. When this change was made Electric Power & Light Corporation owned $1,000,000 par value (10,000 shares) of 7 per cent preferred stock of Utah Power & Light Co. This $1,000,000 par value of the old stock was exchanged for 10,000 shares of $6 no par preferred stock of Utah Power & Light Co. and $166,666.66 in cash. Electric Power & Light Corporation then sold these 10,000 shares of no par preferred stock through Electric Bond & Share Co. at prices netting 94½. By this transaction Electric Power & Light Corporation made a cash profit of $111,666.66 and Electric Bond & Share Co. benefited by $20,000, representing its commission of $2 per share on the sale.

Prior to the year 1925 no dividends were paid by Utah Power & Light Co. on its $30,000,000 of common stock outstanding. All of this common stock was held by Utah Securities Corporation or its successor, Electric Power & Light Corporation, at no cash cost. During the years 1925 to 1930, inclusive, Utah Power & Light Co. has paid the Electric Power & Light Corporation $6,150,000 common-stock dividends in cash.

From 1912 to 1930 the total capitalization of Utah Power & Light Co., consisting of stock and bond issues and surplus, increased from $33,296,338 to $103,038,597 in ledger value. Of this amount $3,400,000 plus was water. From 1913, the first full year of operation, to 1930, its annual operating revenue increased from $1,377,078.75 for 1913 to $10,639,302.80 for 1930.

ELECTRIC BOND & SHARE CO.

Mr. NORRIS. The Electric Power & Light Corporation's offices are those of the Electric Bond & Share Co. They are separate corporations, but as a matter of fact I do not know which owns which; but they own each other. There is not any doubt about that. The Electric Power & Light Corporation has no office. It has no personnel of its own. They are all provided by the Electric Bond & Share Co. They all office together. It is the same concern under different names.

I want to give to the Senate an idea of the wonderful scope of the Electric Bond & Share Co., this great parent corporation in Wall Street, New York.

The Electric Bond & Share Co. in one form or another, through its subsidiaries, either controlled 100 per cent or partially controlled, so that it has complete control over all the transactions and operations of these subsidiaries, operates in the following States:

Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, Wyoming, Arizona, Nevada, Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, and Alabama.

The American Gas & Electric Co., closely affiliated, operates in Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Tennessee.

The American Gas & Electric Co., through its various subsidiaries, has a total write-up, a total amount of water in its capitalization, of $85,000,000.

Electric Bond & Share Co. interests drained millions of dollars out of their Utah utility properties in dividends, fees, and other charges, the Federal Trade Commission disclosed yesterday.

This is from the Washington Herald of June 16, 1932. That is what the evidence disclosed on the day before, June 15, 1932, and the evidence brought out that day showed—

Subholding companies collected $6,150,000 in cash dividends in six years on Utah Power & Light Co. common stock that was pure "water" and cost the controlling interests nothing.

They collected a total of $831,200 in commissions for "finding a buyer" for the company's securities, although the buyer in every instance was the parent Electric Bond & Share Co.

In other words, the Electric Bond & Share Co. charged the subsidiary for finding a buyer for its stock which it itself purchased. I hope Senators get that point. The mother company, acting as agent for the subsidiary, charged the subsidiary a commission for buying the securities of the subsidiary itself!

Since management, engineering, and other fees were introduced many years ago they have brought in $2,973,000 more. Commission records show these fees are more than half profit.

Management fees were collected double through three years from the Utah Co. and from the subholding company above it, it was testified. The debt to the Utah Co. resulting from this overcharge was mingled with other transactions in a later reorganization, and Bond & Share counsel contended it was thus paid.

Inflation of capital in the Utah Co. was put at $34,330,000—

As I have already shown.

Mr. President, as showing just what the commission developed on that day, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD at this point an article from the Washington Daily News of June 16, 1932, entitled "Utah Power Firm's Big Profits Bared by United States Commission."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Thursday, June 16, 1932]

UTAH POWER FIRM'S BIG PROFITS BARED BY UNITED STATES COMMISSION—FIRM FOR WHICH SMOOT SPONSORED ELECTRICITY TAX ON CONSUMERS MAKES HUGE RETURN

Utah Power & Light Co., for whose benefit Senator SMOOT, of Utah, successfully demanded that the electricity tax be carried in the new revenue bill be transferred from corporations to consumers, has been earning lucrative returns even on inflated values, the Federal Trade Commission disclosed to-day.

The commission disclosed that this company, organized by Electric Bond & Share in 1912, bought properties at a total cost of $6,480,708 and immediately entered them on their books as being worth $22,100,000. This was a write-up of about 240 per cent. As new properties were acquired other write-ups were added until they now total $34,330,246, according to Trade Commission records.

WHAT INFLATION MEANT

This inflation, according to the records, was equal to all of the $30,000,000 book value of common stock of the company outstanding in 1930, and to $4,330,246 or 16.8 per cent of the total book value of preferred stock outstanding.

Two weeks ago SMOOT told conferees on the tax bill that a tax on gross earnings of electric power companies "was confiscatory and would bankrupt certain public utility companies in Utah," according to a quotation inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Trade Commission reports, concerning Utah Power & Light, the one large company in SMOOT's State, that generous returns on investment were made by the company in 1930, the last year covered by its investigation.

SHOWS BIG RETURN

The rate of return in that year was 6.7 per cent on fixed capital of the company. After deducting excess of ledger values of properties over cash cost, the rate of return was 9.75 per cent in 1930. After the further deduction of ledger value of intangibles, the rate of return was 10.10 per cent.

This generous rate of return was possible despite numerous large fees paid by Utah Power & Light to Electric Bond & Share and other subsidiaries of the main holding company for services, the record shows. For a time, the company was paying Electric Bond & Share twice for the same service—once directly and once through Utilities Securities Corporation.

From 1917 to 1925 Utah Power & Light Co. paid Utah Securities Corporation a total of $831,000 in commissions ranging from $7 to $10 per share for "finding" a purchaser for 89,200 shares of Utah Power & Light preferred stock. The purchaser "found" in every case was Electric Bond & Share.

Mr. NORRIS. From the evidence before the commission, it was shown that stock watering and the like was found up in the subholding company, where it was perhaps of somewhat less concern to consumers, but of much more direct interest to investors. We must bear in mind that it is not only the consumer who is interested in the honest management of these great corporations dealing in a necessity of life, but the investor must be protected. Recent events have disclosed that hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars have been lost by the honest investor being induced to part with his hard-earned cash for all kinds of securities that were floated upon the market by holding companies and otherwise.

The Electric Bond & Share Co., as managing member of a syndicate, started out on a program of organizing and financing new corporations in 1912 with certain Utah properties that had cost it $2,975,000. These were turned over to a newly formed operating company, which issued against them securities totaling $8,498,000. Of these securities, totaling $8,498,000, approximately $5,000,000 were turned over by the Electric Bond & Share Co. to a newly formed holding company; and against this $5,000,000 of operating company securities the holding company issued $27,499,000 of its own common stock. There was no other consideration involved. The financing thereafter became somewhat complicated, but the upshot of it was that out of the financing of the subholding company the Electric Bond & Share Co. got more than $4,400,000 in cash and stock. This is shown in the summary of the Utah report, which says:

The total financial benefit to Electric Bond & Share Co. from this financing of Utah Securities Corporation (the subholding company) was $201,900 in cash commissions and $4,207,500 par value of common stock of Utah Securities Corporation.

That is just a short review of the evidence I have already put into the RECORD.

I ask permission at this point to insert in the RECORD an article from the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1932, entitled "Huge Profit Made by Utilities Group Is Bared by United States."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUGE PROFIT MADE BY UTILITIES GROUP IS BARED BY UNITED STATES—RETURN OF 200 PER CENT ON CONSTRUCTION AND MANAGEMENT EXPENDITURES IS REVEALED

Utility companies in the Associated Gas & Electric group paid $9,970,944 between 1924 and 1929 for construction and management services which cost their holding companies just $3,397,204, the Federal Trade Commission disclosed to-day.

This was a profit of approximately 200 per cent on services rendered.

The Trade Commission has pointed out repeatedly during its utility investigation that utility holding companies have made a practice of transferring large sums of money as fees from the regulated operating companies to unregulated companies. This make possible continuation of high consumer rates.

In the latest group under investigation, seven holding companies were receiving construction and management fees from the network of operating companies in the group.

In 1924 fees collected amounted to $562,191, while the cost of rendering services was $274,378. By 1929 the amount of fees collected had increased to $3,773,563, while the cost of service was $1,294,867.

These disclosures were made in the course of the investigation which the administration has attempted to halt in the name of economy. The Budget Bureau recommended last December that no funds be made available for this work, and President Hoover stressed this in his Budget message. The House refused to let the investigation be stopped and so has the Senate Appropriations Committee. The Senate will pass on the matter next week.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, these investigations from time to time have called forth many protests from all over the country. The evidence disclosed by the Federal Trade Commission in its investigation has shocked the conscience of all honest men and women who are familiar with the disclosures. Nothing like it has ever occurred in the history of the United States.

I have in my hand an editorial from the Mansfield (Ohio) Journal, calling attention to some of the awful disclosures which have been made in this investigation. The title of the editorial is, "Once Again—'The Consumer Pays.'" At this point in my remarks I desire to include that editorial in full.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Mansfield (Ohio) Journal, June 7, 1932]

ONCE AGAIN—"THE CONSUMER PAYS"

The spectacle of a government hog-tied by selfish monopolistic interests rather than functioning in behalf of the public was witnessed yesterday afternoon in Washington during the final stages of enactment of the billion-dollar tax bill which it is now necessary to load upon the American ptople as a result of governmental profligacy, past and present.

By shrewd last-minute manipulation an item of 3 per cent tax on the consumption of electricity, originally voted by the Senate against the gross income of power companies, was changed in the Senate and House conference to provide for the tax being collected by power companies from consumers.

Under the routine of parliamentary procedure the protest raised against this action by the conferees was promptly overruled by Vice President Curtis, and in an appeal to the Senate it lost by the narrow margin of 41 to 33.

As handled this shifting of the tax on consumption of electricity from the power companies to the consumer is an example of clever manipulation of legislation in the interests of powerful special interests that it would be difficult to surpass. The intent was to assess the 3 per cent tax against the power companies marketing electricity and agreement on the item was in that form—left so until the last possible minute so that efforts of those looking to the real interests of the public might be construed as an attempt to impede the passage of the bill, for which all machinery had been well greased.

It would have been colossal incompetence, however, on the part of lobbyists for the power interests to have permitted the item to stand in its original form—this added penalty for using electricity must be passed along to the consumers.

The pathetic impotence of the well-intentioned Senators who sponsored this item, intending it as a fair assessment against the income of power companies, is shown by the manner in which it was turned against them and made to increase the heavy toll already being paid to unbridled monopoly's supergovernment.

Sponsors of the item, joined by a number of Democrats and Republicans, assailed the action, denounced shifting the tax from power companies to consumers and contended the conferees had exceeded their authority—but all to no purpose—the power companies know how to do those things, and they do them.

The final vote in the Senate was 46 to 35, and while the individual explanations of its opponents will be awaited with interest it is entirely probable that the vote for its passage would have been considerably higher had it not been for the last-minute atrocity perpetrated upon it by the power interests.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have another editorial, from the Galveston Daily News, of Galveston, Tex., entitled "How the Power Companies Were Saved $60,000,000." I ask to have that printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Galveston Daily News, Galveston, Tex., June 11, 1932]

SHIFTING TAX—HOW THE POWER COMPANIES WERE SAVED $60,000,000

Among the new taxes to be collected after June 21 is a 3 per cent levy on electrical energy for domestic or commercial use. This tax is to be collected by the vendor from the consumer and remitted by the vendor to the collector of internal revenue. It applies to publicly as well as privately owned power plants.

For example, a Galveston householder incurs a bill of $10 for electric service. To that amount the local electric company adds a tax of 30 cents, payable with the bill itself. It is a sales tax which falls directly on the consumer. Companies selling electric energy merely function as tax collectors for the Government.

How this electric energy tax was switched from the producer to the consumer forms one of the most interesting and singular episodes in the checkered career of the tax bill. From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these facts are gleaned:

When the tax bill was being debated in the Senate a few days before its final passage, Senator HOWELL, of Nebraska, offered an amendment to levy upon energy sold by privately owned and operated electrical power companies "a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold, payable from net income but not otherwise." In other words, he proposed to collect the tax from the producers. Senator HOWELL had offered the same amendment to the Finance Committee, but it had been rejected.

The usual lengthy debate ensued, in the course of which Senator SMOOT offered an amendment to impose a 5 per cent tax, collected by the vendor, upon electrical energy sold for domestic purposes. It was rejected, 45 to 40. Senator REED, of Pennsylvania, then offered an amendment identical with SMOOT's except that it proposed to tax energy sold for commercial as well as domestic purposes. It was rejected, 47 to 35. Both amendments sought to relieve the producer from taxation. After further debate the Howell amendment was put to a vote and carried, 61 to 19. Thus it was clearly indicated that the Senate desired the tax to be paid by the producer rather than the consumer.

After the bill emerged from conference committee, however, it was discovered that it provided for a 3 per cent tax on the consumer. When Senator HOWELL challenged the Senate conferees to explain the alteration they declined to do so. But the bill was then up for final passage, and supporters of the Howell amendment had no alternative but to accept the alteration or delay the entire bill. This was after President Hoover had made his personal appeal to balance the Budget. Rather than be put in the attitude of obstructing the Budget balancing process, a majority of the Senators voted for the bill. In other words, high-pressure tactics were used to force through a sales tax to which the Senate previously had registered its overwhelming opposition.

As a result of this secret juggling in conference, the $60,000,000 it is estimated this tax will yield will come from the pockets of the people—3 cents on every dollar's worth of electricity used—instead of from the coffers of the power companies, which have felt the effects of the depression perhaps less than any other major industry. REED and SMOOT fought the power companies' fight in debate. SMOOT asserted that if the tax were collected from the consumers it would bankrupt every power company in Utah, though the Howell amendment plainly provided that the tax should come from net income. If no net income were earned, naturally no tax could be collected. But at no time was any proof produced to show that the power companies were actually unable to pay the tax. Had the power companies themselves pulled the strings the strategy which saved them $60,000,000 a year couldn't have been more effectively handled.

It isn't often the public is victimized to the tune of $60,000,000 by an operation which suggests nothing so much as the shell game formerly used to separate yokels from their money at county fairs.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there were a series of three articles, all of them short, written by M. L. Ramsay, of the Hearst Service, who has followed, perhaps as fully as anybody in this busy world can, the disclosures made from time to time in this wonderful investigation. These articles appeared in the New York American and other Hearst publications. The titles are, "Water Power Looters Face Crisis in Court Decision," "Inflation by Power Companies Declared Menace to Investors," and "Strict Federal Regulation Needed to Prevent Power Firm Inflation." I ask unanimous consent to have the articles printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATER POWER LOOTERS FACE CRISIS IN COURT DECISION—GOVERNMENT CALLED UPON TO PRESERVE SITES IN PUBLIC CONTROL, AS RIGHT TO INVESTIGATE PLANT'S COST IS UPHELD IN CLARION RIVER CASE

By M. L. Ramsay, Universal Service correspondent

(This is the first of a series of three articles by M. L. Ramsay, a Washington correspondent for Universal Service and specialist on power, regarding the Government's recent court victory in the Clarion River case. The articles will discuss the effect of the victory upon ownership of power sites, consumers' rates, and protection of investors.)

WASHINGTON, June 17.—By a second overwhelming victory in the Clarion River Power Co. case, the Federal Government and the States have been brought face to face with a crisis in the looting of water-power resources, which has gone stealthily forward for 12 years.

Power Trust leases upon public hydroelectric sites are judicially proclaimed "a gratuity, a privilege from the sovereign."

They "can only be justified on the theory of the benefit to inure to the public."

In such forceful and all-inclusive language the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has summoned the Government to make restitution for a dozen years' neglect and inaction; to preserve the Nation's power sites in public ownership and control.

The court's notable opinion, written by Associate Justice Charles H. Robb, backs up another equally sweeping by Associate Justice Jesse C. Adkins, of the District Supreme Court.

Together, and beyond the fundamental question of ownership, they lay a broad and strong foundation for cheaper electricity for consumers; safety for investors.

DUTY IS PLAIN

Strict regulation of Power Trust plant investment is held the plain and inescapable duty of the Federal Power Commission. That duty is not to be delegated to Power Trust financiers. And the duty is pointed out expressly with a view to the preservation of ownership, the control of rates, and the safeguarding of the investor, as well as the consumer, from the menace of heavy losses lurking in inflation and manipulation.

The decisions uphold specifically the Government's right to investigate how much a power company spent to build a hydroelectric plant on the Clarion River in Pennsylvania, and then fix officially the amount of this investment.

The power company wanted to write its own ticket. The Government was merely to file the company's claim. If it doubted any items, it was to wait 50 years until the company's lease upon the waters of the United States and the State of Pennsylvania should have expired.

COURT TO ACT TARDILY

Then, if anyone wanted to be sure how much the company's plant cost, a Federal court was to try to find out.

Rejecting this contention and an alternative the company proposed, the appeals court said:

"In our view, such an interpretation of the statute is unreasonable, for during the 20 or 50 years the regulatory powers of the commission must be constantly exercised."

On this and other points the tribunal saw eye to eye with the lower court.

Although power company lawyers say the case will be carried up to the United States Supreme Court, attorneys generally think the decision will stand.

Hence the critical conflict shifts to the Federal Power Commission. There five commissioners are about to start deciding issues of power-plant investment, like the Clarion case, involving thus far a total of $600,000,000.

AUTHORITY UNLIMITED

Most directly at stake is a difference of scores of millions, between Power Trust claims and proposed Government allowances.

The commission has unlimited authority over the 12-year accumulation of cases. Some are close to decision, which is understood to wait upon:

1. Confirmation or rejection by the Senate of the reappointment of Marcel Garsaud, of New Orleans, whose vote gives the conservative group in the commission a majority.

2. Adjournment of Congress, forestalling for months to come either effective protest or possible remedy, if the commissioners sanction inflation.

The commissioners' decisions will largely govern reasonableness of rates, soundness of securities and the continued public ownership—or the loss for all time—of leased power sites.

The issue of public ownership of the power sites underlies the issue of investment in this way. After fighting against all water-power regulation for 15 years, the power companies spent the decade from 1920 to 1930 in obstructing and evading it.

BLOCKED THE WAY

In this period they blocked completely the establishment of immediate reserves, and of machinery for future reserves, which would reduce the cost to the Government of recapturing plants and recovering sites. That was a long step toward permanent alienation of the resources.

Their alienation will be completed if recapture prices are made prohibitive. The power companies have submitted huge claims of investment which threaten this effect and thus far have thwarted every effort to root out the inflation.

Had the Government lost the Clarion case, the huge alleged investment would have been permitted to stand, making recapture virtually impossible.

The price of the recapture or purchase of the Clarion plant by Chief Accountant William V. King's figures, would be based upon an original cost of less than $6,000,000. By the company's figures the base would be $11,032,000, which, with additions through the years, probably would make the recapture price prohibitive.

WHAT ROOSEVELT SAID

Accordingly the company would keep its plant and with it the public's power site. The result would be the permanent vested rights which Theodore Roosevelt scornfully refused to confer in the James River case 23 years ago. His prophetic veto message said:

"To give this away, one of our greatest resources, without recompense, would be an act of folly.

"If we are guilty of this, our children will be forced to pay an annual return upon capitalization based upon the highest price which the traffic will bear.

"They will find themselves face to face with a powerful interest entrenched behind the doctrine of vested rights and strengthened by every defense which money can buy and the ingenuity of capable corporation lawyers can devise.

"Long before that time they may, and very probably will, become a consolidated interest, controlled from the great financial centers, dictating the terms on which the citizen can conduct his business and earn his livelihood, and not amenable to the wholesome check of public opinion."

(NOTE.—The second article of this series will record the conspicuous result of the court decision, which will enable the Government to work out of hydroelectric companies millions of dollars in inflation.)

INFLATION BY POWER COMPANIES DECLARED MENACE TO INVESTORS—COURT BATTLES BY UTILITIES TO AVOID INVESTIGATION INCREASE NEED FOR FEDERAL FUNDS FOR CARRYING ON PROBE

By M. L. Ramsay, Universal Service correspondent

WASHINGTON, June 18.—A conspicuous result of the Government's victory in the Clarion River case is to focus the whole issue of utility rate profiteering, vastly aggravated by the depression.

The court decision clinches the Federal Power Commission's authority to root out of hydroelectric company capital, scores of millions of dollars of inflation already revealed by Power Commission audits and the Federal Trade Commission investigation.

Upon this "water" consumers are forced to pay a return in rates. Against it securities have been issued and sold to investors.

MENACES INVESTOR

That the inflation of power company capital results directly in excessive rates, and menaces the investor as well, was made clear by the District Supreme Court in its Clarion decision.

This decision, now upheld on appeal, warned of "serious effects" of delay in establishing investment accurately. It continued:

"On the one hand it will have a tendency to cause the items to assume the nature of vested interests; on the other if these items, years hence, are finally eliminated from the capital, the value of plaintiff's securities will be suddenly and greatly lessened. And much more important—if items are erroneously retained in the capital accounts, the rates to be charged by the plaintiff during this long period will be higher than if they should be eliminated from the actual net investment at the present time."

RELATIONSHIP SEEN

The same inescapable relationship between cost or investment on the one hand, and rates and profits on the other, was seen by the appellate court:

"Under section 16 the United States is authorized to take over a project in time of war by paying compensation fixed by the commission 'upon the basis of a reasonable profit in time of peace.' Under the act reasonable profit depends upon original cost.

"Under sections 19 and 20 the commission is authorized to fix rates under the various conditions and circumstances recited in those sections, and the basis of these rates under the provisions of the act is the original cost of the project."

"COSTS" IN AUDIT

In the cost of the Clarion River plant auditors found items like these:

Four dozen neckties bought at a fashionable New York shop—$144. Tips to porters, etc., $95.

Expenses grand opening (of power plant), $4,365.

Fee to controlling interests for persuading their construction company to build a plant for their power company, $200,000.

Fee to same interests for persuading their utility company to buy their power company's output, $300,000.

For persuading this utility company to guarantee the power company's bonds, $200,000.

For interesting investors and expenses in connection with security issues, $294,000.

TAKES SEVEN YEARS

Governmental effort to get the facts in this case has required thus far, seven years. Three audits were thwarted by failure of the company to furnish complete records.

In 1928 the power commission reported the facts to Congress with this comment:

"The book costs of this project are probably inflated by not less than $4,000,000, and possibly by much more. * * * Further action is dependent upon securing means to prosecute such cases of apparently flagrant lack of compliance with the law."

But Congress was not permitted to see this report. The Niagara Falls Power Co., whose finances were similarly dissected, induced the commission to withdraw it and strike out all such disclosures.

Thereupon the House voted down a bill to supply the commission with auditors and lawyers, with one Representative declaring bluntly that two-thirds of the Members knew virtually nothing about what they were voting upon.

REFUGE IN COURTS

When the suppression of the report to Congress, and the Clarion case itself, were brought to light by Senate investigators two years later, prodding the power commission into action, the Clarion Co. took refuge in the courts.

Precisely the same fight is being made by the utilities against disclosures of rate secrets by other regulatory and investigative agencies.

Control of the Clarion plant, although not the responsibility for its original financing, rests with the Associated Gas & Electric Co.

This company has been contesting before the Public Service Commission and the courts of New Hampshire for two years an attempt to disclose and regulate the toll taken by companies higher up from rates paid by the consumers to operating companies.

It has just halted a similar investigation in New York by refusal to produce witnesses.

FUNDS REQUIRED

The associated system is under examination by the Federal Trade Commission in the general investigation of utilities. It will escape much of this inquiry, with the greatest of the Morgan combines and the Cities Service system, unless Congress provides funds.

The Budget estimates of President Hoover, who has vouched for the power companies' "glass pockets," failed to provide for the power investigation.

Meanwhile a rejuvenated utility commission in Wisconsin and a few elsewhere are working to bring rates down in some relation to the fall of other prices and to shrunken incomes.

Although holding companies have been hard hit, operating power companies have maintained their profits at predepression levels.

Power Commission and Trade Commission audits have shown that a large part of these profits is being paid out upon "water," and this "water" remains frozen in the capital of operating companies with which the consumer deals, even while the holding companies are scaling down their capitalization.

STRICT FEDERAL REGULATION NEEDED TO PREVENT POWER FIRM INFLATION—PROPAGANDA DIRECTED AGAINST CITY, STATE, AND FEDERAL DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS FAILS

(By M. L. Ramsay, Universal Service correspondent)

WASHINGTON, June 19.—Preventing a repetition of recent losses of hundreds of millions of dollars to investors in power securities, through strict Federal regulation, is one of the great possibilities held out by the Clarion River decisions.

Such regulation is generally regarded in Washington as inevitable, especially since these losses have occurred in a virtually "depression proof" industry.

Power company profits on the average are about as large as before the depression. "Not one of the major operating companies has omitted dividends so far," according to the Electrical World.

The flood of "water" that has been poured into them has been turned to gold by expanding sales of electricity to household users at top rates. Accordingly the investor who bought operating company securities has suffered only to a limited extent. The consumer has made good for him.

LOSSES LOCALIZED

Greatest losses to investors have been largely localized in the holding companies, supersensitive to small-profit fluctuations, and revealed by the Trade Commission as more flagrantly manipulated and "watered" than the operating companies.

The Clarion decisions would sustain, even with existing but unused legal machinery, regulation of security issues of operating water-power companies. It would thus embrace a substantial part of the financing upon which has been reared the superstructure of holding company financing.

With new legislation the same decisions would help to sustain direct regulation of holding company securities.

Many States have no control over utility security issues, and none regulates holding company securities. The Power Trust's supreme effort in this field has been directed against regulation by the Federal Government, which has an ample authority the States lack.

ORDER POSTPONED

Confronted with this relentless opposition, the Federal Power Commission has regulated securities only once. Then, acting with State authorities in the preliminary steps, it reduced proposed flotations for the Conowingo plant in Maryland by more than $5,000,000.

Even here determination of the amount actually invested in the project remains incomplete after six years.

Just before the Coolidge Power Commission went out of office it adopted an order for a limited regulation of securities. At the first meeting of the Hoover commission, enforcement of this order was "indefinitely postponed."

It has remained postponed right down to date.

Two years later a "joker" which would have wiped out even the authority for securities regulation was found in a power commission reorganization bill. It was detected and removed.

PROPAGANDA FAILS

On all three cardinal issues of ownership of sites, consumers' rates, and securities, the importance of the Clarion decisions is enhanced by a collapse of the Power Trust propaganda to belittle water power's importance.

A thunder of this propaganda has dinned into the ears of the country for several years past the dogma that water power was out of date, "uneconomic." It had been outstripped by cheap production of power from coal and natural gas.

This propaganda was aimed directly at the city, State, and Federal development projects, commonly hydroelectric. By extension it grew into arguments that strict regulation of investment and safeguarding of public rights of recapture where the resources had been leased to the trust were a waste of money.

First the propaganda boomeranged against the industry when investors and bankers became doubtful about hydro plants.

USE REVEALED

Now a report by the industry and the Bureau of Mines discloses that the country's water power, only about 20 per cent developed, has supplied lately as much as 46 per cent of national power requirements, the largest proportion on record.

And the Electrical World, telling how power companies are weathering the depression, reveals that—

"Various economies of labor and operation have been introduced, notably the extensive use of hydro capacity on many properties * * *."

The Power Trust's "privilege from the sovereign," as the governmental grants to it were styled by the District Court of Appeals, is being exploited to the limit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I now want to pass to another branch of the subject, to show the influence and the strength of the Power Trust, even coming up to the very verge of the court itself. They have not hesitated to penetrate any sanctum by any means, if they were able to influence anybody, from the private citizen clear to the top of the Government, and especially influence anyone occupying an official position.

There has been a great deal of litigation. I am going to call attention to only one case, and only briefly to that. I refer to the litigation now pending in the Federal courts in regard to the New River project, where the Power Trust is seeking to get a license to build a dam in that river, claiming that it is not subject under the law to the water power dam act passed by Congress, and that the Federal Power Commission—I am speaking of the Federal Power Commission and not the Federal Trade Commission, for the time being—has no jurisdiction.

A great deal was said in the newspapers some time ago about the concealing from the public of an answer filed by the commission. Incidentally, everybody knows, I think, that the commission is not any too friendly in its aspects to the people in the controversy it is having with this great power institution.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. HUSTON THOMPSON

On account of public sentiment in the matter it was found advisable to, and they did, employ a very eminent attorney to represent the Federal Government, which in that case was the Federal Power Commission, in this litigation. Mr. Huston Thompson, a former member of the Federal Trade Commission, an attorney of national reputation, and of unquestioned ability and honesty, was retained.

Senators will remember that there was a great deal in the newspapers at the time to the effect that Mr. Thompson's answer had been taken away from the files by a member of the bar representing the power company, that newspaper men went from Washington down to Lynchburg, where the clerk's office was located, and were unable to get a copy or to see the answer which had been filed, which Mr. Thompson had prepared and sent down there.

I have had some difficulty in getting that answer. I have had correspondence with several officials with regard to it. I finally wrote to Mr. Thompson himself and asked for a copy of the answer.

The power company was afraid to have the public see the allegations Mr. Thompson made in his answer. He prepared the answer and sent it down to the clerk. At the same time he sent a copy of the answer to the attorneys in the case, including Mr. Abbott, the local attorney at Lynchburg. Mr. Abbott immediately went to the clerk's office, and, being an attorney of record, of course, was allowed to take the answer from the files. He took it, although he had in his pocket at the time a copy of the answer sent to him by Mr. Thompson through the mail. When anybody went to see the answer, when newspapermen went all the way from Washington to get a copy of that answer from the records, they were told that the attorney had come to the office and gotten the answer.

They went to his office and he refused to give it to them. He kept it in his pocket, and it never saw the light of day until some time after, when there was a hearing before the judge on a motion which had been filed prior to the answer being filed, which gave them an ostensible reason for keeping the answer from the public, because the motion had, as a matter of fact, not yet been disposed of.

I want to read this letter from Mr. Thompson:

I am in receipt of your letter of recent date, together with the correspondence between you and the Federal Power Commission relative to your being allowed a copy of the answer that was tendered by me to the clerk of the United States district court at Lynchburg, Va., in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. against George Otis Smith et al. The culmination of the correspondence on the part of the commission leaves it up to me or the Department of Justice as to the sending of the answer to you. In your letter you also asked me to advise you as to the publicity of the answer.

Permit me to say that since I have been connected with this case I have purposely refused all interviews with the press and have given out no publicity. I feel, however, that as the commission is the agent of Congress and as this document when it was tendered to the clerk of the United States district court was a public document, that it would not be proper for me to refuse to let you have the answer, nor would it be within my province to say what you shall do with it after you have received it. I am therefore forwarding a copy of the answer to you herewith.

I may say that I had written to the commission and asked them to send me a copy of the answer. They had a copy and they sent it to me, but they said in their letter that it was confidential and that I would not be allowed to use it. Without reading the answer, I sent it back and said I would not accept it on those conditions. That resulted in my writing Mr. Thompson, and the letter I am now reading is an answer to my letter to him.

I do not know that all of it would be interesting. The part I want to get to is as to what happened with the answer Mr. Thompson sent down to the clerk's office. I continue reading from Mr. Thompson's letter:

You have informed the commission and me that you have heard from many sources the facts that occurred with respect to the tendering of the answer, and you therefore request me to give you what information I have about it. The following are the circumstances:

On March 14, 1932, at Norfolk, Va., counsel for plaintiff and defendants appeared before Judge Luther Way, who entered an order upon the request of plaintiff requiring the defendants to file a motion to dismiss plaintiff's bill within a certain time and thereafter to tender their answer to the clerk of the United States district court. I objected to tendering answer before we had finished with the motion to dismiss, but counsel for plaintiff insisted on their right to see the answer regardless of the consideration of the motion. I filed the answer on April 27 with the clerk as required. I also sent copies to the several counsel for plaintiff, including Mr. Abbott, of Lynchburg, Va., and received acknowledgment from him that he had received his copy on the 27th.

On the 28th members of the press called me and asked for a copy of the answer. I refused their request, stating that I did not wish to appear in any way as encouraging publicity, but that the document was a public document and that they could get a copy at Lynchburg. On the 29th I was informed by a Mr. Ramsey, a member of the press, that he had been to Lynchburg and asked the clerk for the answer. The clerk, according to Mr. Ramsey, informed him that he did not have the answer, the same being in the possession of Mr. Abbott, attorney for plaintiff; that Mr. Ramsey then went to Mr. Abbott and requested permission to see the answer; that the latter refused to permit him to see it, to state what was in it or whether he would return it to the clerk. Mr. Ramsey and other members of the press again requested a copy, and I declined for the aforesaid reasons.

On May 2 I was in the courtroom at Norfolk prepared to argue the right of certain parties to intervene in the case. Mr. Jackson, of counsel for plaintiff, asked me to take part in a conference in the judge's chambers, and I acquiesced. Counsel immediately began attacking the answer as scandalous. Judge Way was called out into the courtroom by the grand jury, which was assembled, and in his absence counsel attacked me on the ground that my purpose was that of seeking publicity. I refused to discuss the matter and left the room, being followed by counsel who begged me not to insist on the answer being filed as it would be very injurious to them at this time of depression.

After considering the matter during the lunch hour, I finally agreed that if counsel would make the motion to withdraw the answer pending the action on the motion to dismiss and right was reserved to me to renew my tender of the answer, if I thought it necessary after action on the motion to dismiss, that I would not oppose counsel's motion. Subsequently the matter was brought up in court, counsel made his motion, and I notified the court that I would not oppose it under the circumstances presented to me. The court then asked us to retire and draw the order. When the order was completed and signed by us and we started for the court room Mr. Abbott stepped up and drew the answer which I had filed from his pocket and handed it to me. Subsequently in the court room the court admonished Mr. Abbott not to do such a thing again. I was informed thereafter that the answer had never been returned to the clerk after Mr. Abbott had taken it from the clerk's office.

Mr. President, it is interesting to know just what there was in that answer that made this great power-trust corporation afraid to have publicity. Their own attorney went to the clerk's office, taking advantage of the fact that he was an attorney, and took away the answer and never returned it to the files of the court. I think probably this is the part of the answer which had a good deal to do with the taking away of the answer by the attorney for the power trust. I am reading just a part of the allegations, just a part of one paragraph of the answer:

That plaintiff at all times—

This is referring to the power company that is trying to get a very valuable power site for the building of a dam and going into court to prevent the Federal Government from having anything to say under the power act as to the cost or the kind of a dam or anything whatever to do with it, claiming that the act passed by Congress had no application to the particular case. The Government of the United States, through Mr. Huston Thompson, in its answer, said, among a great many other things, referring to the power company:

That plaintiff at all times has followed a system of "writing up" its investments in its projects. That in the past it has made an investment in all of its properties, of, to wit, $72,621,455.20, being the total book value, and has issued and sold securities on said investment of $139,039,648, being an increase of $66,418,192.80 above the total book value, and has issued securities upon the basis of said "write-up"—

"Write-up," we must all remember, in common language means water pumped into the capitalization of the corporation—has issued securities upon the basis of said "write up" and has sold a great part of said securities, based upon fictitious values of, to wit, many millions of dollars, to the public; that plaintiff sought to be relieved under section 23 of the said act of all restrictions on the part of the Federal Power Commission so that it might continue in its proposed project its practice of "writing up" over and above the actual investment as in its other projects, to wit, to the extent of many millions of dollars in securities, and of selling them to the public; and defendants aver that it was for this reason that plaintiff sought and now seeks to be relieved of the control by the Federal Power Commission over the construction, operation, and financing of its project.

That got into court. Mr. Huston Thompson, on behalf in reality of the people of the United States, in his official capacity has made this allegation in a suit now pending in court, and so afraid were the Power Trust and their attorney that the public would find out something about what Mr. Thompson had alleged that they took the paper from the clerk's office and refused to let anybody see it—a public document filed with the clerk of the United States court taken away by the attorney for the Power Trust in order, as Mr. Thompson's letter said, to conceal from the public the allegations that had been made on behalf of the public for fear, as they said, in this time of depression it might injure them financially.

They are afraid of the truth. They dare not face the truth. They are adepts in covering up the truth and here is an illustration where they have gone into the very presence of the ermine of the judiciary in order to conceal the truth from the American public. They were afraid to let the newspaper people go into court and read a public document filed in a law suit. It might injure them. It would not injure them in the financial market if they had been honest. The reason they are afraid that it would injure them is because of the allegation that they were dishonest, that they were selling securities to the public the only value in which was water, that they were "writing up" overnight their capitalization by the millions and then selling the securities to the investing public.

That is the allegation which was made in that case in court, and so afraid were the Power Trust that the public would find it out that, in violation of all professional ethics, the attorney for the Power Trust took the papers away and kept them away so nobody could see them. If that had happened in my State before a justice of the peace the attorney who would do such a thing would have been disbarred from practice. It is unprofessional and unethical. But if a Power Trust attorney does it, it is bright, sharp practice and he can stand forth without any criticism. He was lightly tapped on the hand by the judge. The judge said, "Do not do that again." That was his punishment. This is only another example of the depths to which the Power Trust will stoop in trying to carry out its program of controlling the United States Government.

HOLDING COMPANIES VERSUS OPERATING COMPANIES

Mr. President, the investigation before the Federal Trade Commission will show that operating companies—an operating company is the company which makes the electricity and sells it—have been milked of very large sums in fees and charges of various sorts by contracts forced upon them by their controlling holding companies. In the case of the Electric Bond & Share Co. we are without complete information because certain books have been refused and the case for their production is still pending in court. I ought to say, by the way, that the Federal Trade Commission is in court now to try to get some of the books that some of the corporations have refused to permit their experts to examine.

But the commission was able to determine that on the fees charged to operating companies Electric Bond & Share Co. made as high as 105 per cent profit on the cost of doing the work, this in the face of the fact that its responsible officers had solemnly told the commission in a prior investigation that all of these services were rendered at actual cost. This was so reported to the Senate in the Senate Document 213, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, page 75. They testified early in the hearings that when the holding companies like the Electric Bond & Share Co. did perform some service for an operating company, they charged nothing but the actual cost for the service. They testified to that and the Federal Trade Commission so reported. But further investigation developed that that testimony was not true, but that they made a profit as high as 105 per cent on some of the things they did for the operating companies. That means that the consumer of electricity had to pay that enormous profit of a corporation in reality charging itself a commission for something it did itself for itself. That is the reason why they have so many corporations. One can charge the other, and it in turn can charge the next one, and so on.

Operating companies have been charged by their holding group Federal income taxes. I am coming to something that I wish the people of the United States knew. I wish that Congress knew it because I doubt whether many of us are informed on the particular point. Operating companies have been charged by their holding group Federal income taxes based on their total income, but such sums have not been paid to the Government because of the permission to file consolidated returns, enabling the holding company to consolidate a weak sister with a prosperous operating company. One may examine the books of the operating company and find that a certain amount is charged for income taxes to the Federal Government, but that goes to the holding company and they consume it. If there is any other operating company that has not made a profit upon which such a tax would be payable, they put them all together and keep the money, and the Federal Government goes without taxes. That is the way they operate it.

In some cases the amount so charged to the consumers of the operating company has been very large, although little or none of it has reached the Federal Treasury. In other words, the consumer pays the tax, but the Government does not get it. Somewhere along the line from one holding company to another it is gobbled up by a holding company. Here are two examples shown officially before the Federal Trade Commission.

Exhibit 4834, report of Examiner Roger E. Barnes on New England Power Association, in parts 31 and 32, at pages 632 and 633, contains this information, and this is the official record of the Federal Trade Commission from which I am going to quote:

> The association charges the subsidiary companies an amount equal to the tax that would have been paid had an individual return been filed. It then files a consolidated return which is less in aggregate than the total of all the companies computed on the basis of individual returns. By this method the association collected more for taxes than it paid by the amount of $304,633.64 in 1928, and $72,337.72 in 1929.

That is going on right under the nose of Congress. Following that which I have just quoted is a table showing from which subsidiaries the aggregates are collected.

Exhibit 4868, part 33-34, page 777, shows that the North American Co. collected more from its subsidiaries for Federal income tax than it paid to the Government by the following amounts for the years shown: In 1927 the North American Holding Co. collected $324,915.17 more in income taxes from its subsidiaries than it paid to the Government of the United States. I wonder if Senators get that point. In 1928, this same corporation collected $675,000 more from its subsidiaries for income taxes than it paid to the Federal Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. How could they do that except through the neglect of the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator did not hear what I previously read, and I will read it again. This is the way it is done; this is an official quotation.

> The association charges the subsidiary companies an amount equal to the taxes that would have been paid had an individual return been filed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish reading this, and I think I shall make it plain.

> It then files a consolidated return which is less in the aggregate than the total of all the companies computed on a basis of individual returns. By this method the association collected more for taxes than it paid.

Mr. BORAH. Would not its return to the Government be a false return?

Mr. NORRIS. I take it not, I will say to the Senator from Idaho. I think it is the fault of the law which permits them to file consolidated returns, but I doubt whether it is according to law when they collect a sum for taxes and keep it themselves. Whether it is legal; at least it is morally wrong. The consumers in a community are compelled to pay, and the holding company collects taxes as though that company were the only company, but over here in another State they have a company that has not prospered so well; they put them both together and they make a consolidated return to the Government, the subsidiary not making a return, and in that way they make these profits. In other words, they do not hesitate to charge the consumers hundreds of thousands of dollars on account of taxes which they never pay; they keep the money; and that is where they get some of their profits.

When the Senator from Idaho interrupted me I was not through. I had given the figures as to this company for two years. I am now speaking of the North American Co. I gave its profits in 1927 and also in 1928 from this method of computing taxes. In 1929 this company collected $275,000 more from the subsidiaries for taxes than it paid to the Federal Government. That is for three years of which we have a record. Combined in those three years, what does it mean? It means that this one company in this one instance has collected in three years $1,274,915.17 more for taxes than it paid to the Federal Government for taxes.

I wonder if anybody would like to stop an investigation that is developing that kind of financial manipulation that is going on, every penny of which is paid for by the consumers of electricity by the charges levied upon them, while these poor corporations can not afford to pay the tax that the Senate proposed to levy upon them as taxes have been levied upon everybody else? They said, "Oh, no; we can not pay it." So the conferees were so kind to them as to bring in a conference report by which we took the tax off them and put it on the little fellow, who is not organized, who can not cry out, and who is so used to being pressed down to the ground that it is felt he will stand for it without complaint. These big fellows, these millionaires, these fellows who are turning water into gold by the millions, they can not pay the tax; it would not be right to tax them; they are exempt; they are too holy; we must not tax them. Tax the poor devil, tax the fellow that is ground down into the earth now by paying exorbitant taxes for this necessity of life.

Information is that already several holding companies have abolished service fees, put them at cost or lowered them, all to the benefit of the consumer and to the rates.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that is true; I have no doubt that many of these corporations, with this investigation going on, seeing what is in store for them, and what is ahead, have changed their practice in this regard. They paid hundreds of thousands of dollars, and used the people's pennies in doing so, to kill and to prevent the investigation, but as it goes on it is disclosing this highway robbery and it has had this effect. As stated, much of it has ceased because the light of day has commenced to penetrate into their activities; their sins are being told to the people of the country, and in the face of the sentiment it would create they can no longer keep up such a practice. So the investigation has paid for itself many times over in the money that it has saved the modest class of people in the United States in the way of electric-light rates.

In some instances original surpluses to the lure of investors have been shown to consist largely of "write-ups." I think I have covered that point.

In the case of the taking over by the Insull and North American group of the Studebaker group the admission obtained by the chief counsel from a responsible officer on the witness stand comes mighty near to showing direct violation of the antitrust laws in their efforts to control and divide territory and to suppress competition.

I wish everyone could read the testimony referred to in that statement. Mr. Healy, the able attorney who has been employed and who has had charge of this investigation, has shown in my judgment that these corporations are violating the antitrust laws. They divide the country up between them; they do as was done in Cæsar's time, "divide Gaul into three parts."

One of the outstanding facts which appears as a result of the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of utilities, and which seems supported by general knowledge and information, is that the local operating companies and their moderate-salaried staffs have quite generally carried on well; that the operating companies, except in cases where their superimposed holding companies have borrowed what they can not repay, are generally sound. This means that in the utility structure it is not the high-salaried absentee financiers and so-called general supervisory managers who have done the work, but that the low-salaried local men are the real performers. But this again leads to the inescapable conclusion that something is wrong in the utilities structure and that a remedy must be found for the system which has put upon the backs of these operating companies an unwarranted load of capital structure, of fees and charges of various sorts and even compelled them to part with their money on forced loans.

Recently, February 26, the financial editor of the Electrical World, leading paper of the electrical industry, suggested one possible alternative in centralization. This means nothing else in plain English than returning the local operating company to its independent position, permitting it to do its own work and carry its load and then to carry additional loads. Obviously the removal of these loads will be to the benefit of the rate payer, to the benefit of the operating company actually performing the service, and to the benefit of investors.

The service performed by the Federal Trade Commission disclosing the almost endless variety of schemes by which operating companies have been milked is of great value.

GREAT SERVICE OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. President, we do not fully comprehend the great service that the Federal Trade Commission has already rendered the people of the United States. I read not long ago a statement made by some one in behalf of the electric company that supplies Washington with electricity, comparing the present rates with the rates of some years ago. They have been very much reduced; but I venture the assertion here to-day, Mr. President, that if it had not been for those who have found fault, who at the risk of their reputations have proclaimed aloud that this great corporation was unduly milking the poor people of the District of Columbia by making them pay exorbitant rates; if we had not proclaimed that to the world; if there had been no investigation—and they fought the investigation every step of the way and tried to prevent it—if there had been nothing said, we would be paying in the city of Washington to-day 10 cents a kilowatt-hour for electricity, which was the rate when I first began to study this question. Those who have refused to follow the mandates and obey the will and the command of political leaders selected by Power Trust officials to carry out their will, to do their bidding; those who have had the courage to stand out and say "no," have been called bolsheviks and socialists and outcasts in society and in politics, but their work has brought to the people of the United States and to the capital city a saving of millions and millions of dollars in the rates they have been paying for electricity.

The service performed by the Federal Trade Commission, as I have said, has been very great. It is only too bad that this work by the Federal Trade Commission could not have been started three years earlier than it was at the time I introduced my original resolution of investigation. If it had been, I believe the investing public would have been saved literally hundreds of millions of dollars, and the crash that has come to all financial institutions would not have been what it has, as far as utilities, at least, are concerned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is making a very remarkable address. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, during the course of its investigation the Federal Trade Commission, under Senate Resolution 83, to date has made field examinations of the books and accounts and records of about 50 per cent of the public-utility companies coming under the resolution, and has had public hearings, and reported to the Senate on over 33 per cent of the public-utility companies coming under the resolution.

I think it important to consider that fact in connection with what I have already produced in the way of evidence and what I shall produce later on, because this investigation is not finished. Some of the books, documents, and papers have been withheld from the commission, and it has been necessary to go into court in order to have the matter determined. Cases are pending now and undetermined. It may be if the decisions of the courts are against the commission in some of these important investigations that it will be necessary before we finish the investigation to have additional authority conferred by Congress; and I want this taken into consideration, especially in relation to the so-called write-ups that I am soon going to take up, showing what has been developed up to date. Of course, we do know that only a part of it has been disclosed, and what is undisclosed no man now knows.

The Associated Gas & Electric Co.: Beginning June 14 and ending July 1, Examiner Charles Nodder, of the Federal Trade Commission, under questioning by Chief Counsel Robert E. Healy, has put into the public record a most amazing and complicated story of the transactions and practices of the Associated Gas & Electric Co. Into this company have been absorbed two groups which previously were of considerable size and importance, namely, the W. S. Barstow group and the J. G. White Engineering Co. group. At one time the White Co. stood high in its field. The two men who have been the directing geniuses of the complicated Associated Gas & Electric Co. group are H. C. Hopson and J. I. Mange, who control Associated Gas & Electric Properties, a Massachusetts voluntary association, which in turn controls the Associated Gas & Electric Co., with stated balance-sheet assets of nearly $1,000,000,000. About 180 operating companies were in this group at the end of 1929, extending in groups from New England to Arizona, with an operating revenue for 1929 of nearly $69,000,000, of which enough came through to the holding company to make the income of the Associated Gas & Electric Co. nearly $49,000,000.

It is impossible in my limited time to do more than call attention to a few of the outstanding points.

Exhibit 5157, which is the second volume of Mr. Nodder's report, lists and describes 31 different stock and security issues between 1922 and 1931. Mr. Nodder says in his report:

> The financial structure of the Associated Gas & Electric Co. has been of extreme complexity.

One reason for this, he says—

> Is the physical character of the numerous securities issued; their complex, exchangeable, and convertible features, and constant calling and substitution thereof by subsequent issues. This is further complicated by dividend payments on one class of stock made in another class of stock.

A little later he says:

> Securities were issued from time to time without authority of the board, and to correct this situation the board on two occasions passed retroactive resolutions ratifying various issues made.

The total water pumped into the capital of this group was not as large as in some others, amounting in the aggregate to about $20,000,000, which Mr. Nodder was able to demonstrate and which he says probably amounted to some larger figure, which it is impossible to trace through accurately. However, there are many other features, some of which are new and startling, so that the amount of actual inflation becomes comparatively a minor thing.

Prior to December 31, 1929, when the examiner closed his work on their books, the Associated Gas & Electric Co. had paid no Federal income taxes for the years 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929, although it had accrued to itself from its subsidiaries by monthly accruals plus compound interest a sum amounting at that time to $2,938,513.12. (Exhibit 5157, pp. 1061, 1063.)

By a series of intercompany transactions it finally assigned its managerial contracts to the J. G. White Management Corporation, which had cost the Associated Gas & Electric Co. nothing, for a consideration of $8,000,000. (Exhibit 5157, p. 1087.) In other words, they got $8,000,000 for nothing. They pulled it right out of the air.

All value which this assignment carried was based upon what, through its contracts, it could take out of the various operating utility companies.

At another time it received stock valued at $5,100,000 for the assignment of a construction company. (Exhibit 5157, pp. 1093 and 1094.) Outside of certain equipment whatever value it had came from its ability to charge construction fees to the operating companies of the group.

A purchasing company was set up to do all the purchasing for the group. From this purchasing company the associated system received notes in the sum of $3,700,000. The sole value for such payment which the purchasing company capitalized as "cost of contracts" was its right to make purchases for the companies of the system. (Exhibit 5157, pp. 1103 and 1104.) It set up a corporation to buy things for it, that is all.

A company for the sale of appliances in connection with the system was set up which took over the inventories of appliances of the various companies, so that the operating companies thereafter really acted as display agents and sales agents for the merchandising companies. For this privilege the merchandising company paid the associated system $10,000,000. (Exhibit 5157, pp. 1110–1116.)

In other words, this corporation set up another corporation to buy something for it; and when it set up this corporation, it owned the stock—it was itself, in fact—and then it would buy something and turn it over to the other company and charge it a commission of several million dollars, and the transaction would be complete. In other words, it had bought something for itself, in reality, or had done some service for itself, in reality, and then charged itself a commission on what it had done. That is like pulling one's self over the fence by financial bootstraps if there ever was such a thing.

Besides this, H. C. Hopson, one of these two directing geniuses, set up a financial organization under the name "H. C. Hopson & Co.," at 61 Broadway, where the offices of the association are, and through it he has collected many fees for alleged financial services from the system.

In buying out the Barstow interests Mr. Nodder's report shows that for property having a ledger value of $314,614.88 the system paid money in stocks of a total value of $49,923,855.17. This is found beginning on page 535 of Exhibit 5156 and ending at page 548.

This is official information from the Federal Trade Commission. This particular company I am using as a sort of sample—and that is all, just a sample—this corporation set up to buy some other corporation. The report shows that for property having a ledger value of $314,614.88 the system paid $49,923,855.17. That is financial ability. I think some of these fellows who are able to pluck millions out of the air like that ought to be appointed by Mr. Hoover to get away with the deficit, instead of bothering Congress about it.

WATER IN SECURITY VALUES

Mr. President, it would be interesting, I know, at least to the student, to have a general synopsis of the amount of water that has been pumped into security values shown by this investigation up to date. I have it not quite up to date. As I said a while ago, it is not complete—there is more to come—but I have a list in detail showing the so-called "write-ups." I do not like the term "write-up." It is rather a new name in financial phraseology, as I understand it. It is a polite name for "water." It is a polite name for "nothing." It is a polite name for thin air converted into value by a financial hocus-pocus, upon which the people of the country have to pay through all time dividends for the men who have made water into gold, and turned air into currency.

Mr. President, the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission so far has made a showing of companies putting water into capitalization, so-called "write-ups," as follows. We can get the information from Senate Document 92, volume 22, page 1199. The write-ups are as follows of the different companies composing the American Gas & Electric Co.

Appalachian Electric Power Co	$66,418,192.80
Ohio Power Co	2,775,371.77
Indiana & Michigan Electric Co	5,958,475.29
Scranton Electric Co	4,426,327.58
Kentucky-West Virginia Power Co. (Inc.)	3,300,000.00
Atlantic City Electric Co	2,212,774.86
Wheeling Electric Co	901,518.00

Making a total for the American Gas & Electric Co. group of $85,992,660.30.

So much air converted into money. Now, we will take the Electric Bond & Share group.

Electric Bond & Share Co. (S. Doc. 92, vol. 23 and 24, p. 49)	$399,201,827.39

I am considering now the Electric Bond & Share group, but I am taking the American Power & Light Co., one of its subsidiaries, and taking the subsidiaries of that company to start with. They are as follows:

Kansas Gas & Electric Co	$2,547,542.24
Texas Power & Light Co	8,160,000.00
Nebraska Power Co	5,866,452.58
Minnesota Power & Light Co. (Nov., 1920)	20,251,682.47
Minnesota Power & Light Co. (May, 1924)	1,383,246.62
Florida Power & Light Co	30,232,007.85

Making a total for the subsidiaries of the subsidiary of the American Power & Light Co. of $68,440,931.76.

National Power & Light Co., $35,000,000.

Electric Power & Light Corporation, $42,341,947.02.

TOTAL OF WRITE-UPS

Mr. President, what do you imagine is the total of the write-ups? How much water, how much air, have these financial jugglers changed into gold upon which they are taxing the American consumers of electricity? How much do you think, sir, it amounts to up to date, with the investigation probably not much more than half finished? Here is the grand total of the sums I have just read: $925,985,795.26.

Just try to comprehend what that means. With the investigation only partially finished, the Federal Trade Commission have disclosed write-ups in round numbers to the amount of $925,000,000 upon which the poor people, the common people, must pay a profit for all time—not for a day, not for a year, but, unless some change is made by the proper authorities, it must be paid forever. Our people are thus burdened down with $925,000,000 of water upon which we will make them pay through all their long tedious lives an income that will keep in luxury these financial vultures who are thus trespassing upon the rights of their fellow men. Who is going to stand for it? Where is there a representative of the Government of the United States who will say that we should permit this to go on? Yet when we tax them they have influence enough to control the Congress of the United States to take the tax off of themselves and have it put on the poor devil who is already overburdened.

As I showed yesterday in the beginning, all this investigation would have stopped if President Hoover had his way. He is opposed to it all. His own Budget would have cut the Federal Trade Commission off without a dollar to continue this work in behalf of the people. I wonder how long a suffering country is going to stand that kind of treatment? Are we helpless? Is there any way under heaven by which this downtrodden people can be rescued from this great octopus that is hanging about the neck of the Government of the United States? Nine hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars of air for which we are all paying and then we are afraid to tax them!

WHAT FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION HAS ACCOMPLISHED

Mr. President, I have had prepared for me by representatives of the Federal Trade Commission a short synopsis of what the commission has done, what it has accomplished not only in the way of investigating public utilities, but several other big trusts and corporations, including the chain stores and the cement companies. It is an exceedingly interesting document, but I do not believe I shall take the time of the Senate to read it. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my address it may be included and printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The synopsis is as follows:

Since the commission began its public hearings in the power and gas utilities investigation, one of the largest holding company groups has reduced the service charges to its operating companies by over a million dollars a year, and another large group has eliminated entirely all profit from such services to the operating companies, which results in a saving to the operating companies of approximately a million dollars a year. If these reductions to the operating companies have been passed on to the consumers, in these two instances alone consumers have been saved more than the total cost of this investigation, including the amount provided for by this amendment for the next fiscal year. During the progress of this investigation rate reductions to consumers have been quite general. One company stated that $2,600,000 had been saved by residential customers as a result of such a reduction in rates. This is more than twice the total cost of this utilities investigation to date.

By the terms of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act the commission is directed to prevent "unfair methods of competition in commerce," and by the terms of the Clayton Act it is specifically directed to prevent under certain conditions price discrimination (sec. 2), exclusive and tying leases, sales, or contracts (sec. 3), combinations through capital-stock acquisitions (sec. 7), and interlocking directorates (sec. 8). With reference to these practices the commission is without discretion as to whether or not it will proceed. Such methods are declared unlawful, and the commission is directed to prevent them. The procedure to be followed by the commission in preventing such practices is set out in the statutes. When there is brought to the attention of the commission facts which seem to indicate the possible violation of these acts the commission makes a preliminary investigation sufficient to determine whether there is enough merit in the matter to warrant the docketing of the matter for a thorough investigation. If it decides that there is, the matter is docketed as an application for complaint; and after thorough investigation, if the commission believes that a practice prohibited by the statutes is being engaged in and that a proceeding by it would be to the interest of the public, it issues and serves upon those using the practice a complaint charging such person or persons with violation of the particular act involved. After the issuance of such complaint the parties named as respondents have opportunity to file an answer, and after answer is filed testimony is taken and the case is briefed and argued before the commission, which disposes of it by either issuing an order to cease and desist from the practice or practices involved, if it thinks the charges of the complaint have been sustained, or by an order of dismissal, if it believes that such charges have not been sustained.

If an order to cease and desist is issued, the person against whom such order is directed may apply to a United States Circuit Court of Appeals for review of the order, and such court has authority to make and enter a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the commission. The commission may appeal to such court for enforcement of an order to cease and desist where such is not obeyed. The proceedings before a circuit court of appeals are subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari. The commission can compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents in proceedings before it by action before a district court of the United States.

Since its organization and up to June 30, 1931, the commission has under these powers instituted 19,212 inquiries, of which it has dismissed after preliminary investigation 12,296 and has docketed as applications for complaints 6,609. Of these investigations which have been docketed as applications for complaints, 4,228 have been dismissed, after thorough investigation, without the issuance of complaint. Complaints have been issued in 1,972 of the matters, and after proceedings on the complaints orders to cease and desist have been issued in 1,080 instances and the complaints dismissed in 662 instances. The other matters are still pending, awaiting final disposition. In the lower Federal courts the commission has had 193 cases, of which 182 had been disposed of by June 30, 1931. In the Supreme Court it had had 57 cases, all of which had been disposed of by June 30, 1931.

By these orders to cease and desist the commission has prohibited such practices as false and misleading advertising as to business status, nature of product, indorsement of product, results of product, source of product, etc.; misleading trade or corporate name; the use of bogus independents; combining and conspiring to restrain or monopolize trade by seeking to cut off competitors' sources of supply, labor, to fix and maintain prices, etc.; threatening suits not in good faith; maintaining resale prices; misbranding; wrongfully disparaging or misrepresenting competitors or their products; using exclusive dealing or tying contracts, price discrimination, the acquisition of stock of competitors, and many others.

It has been testified that as a result of one of these cases alone the farmers of the Middle West were saved $30,000,000 annually (the case against the United States Steel Corporation, so-called Pittsburgh Plus case). In another case the commission protected the cooperative method of marketing grain and established the right of farmer organizations, grain growers, and shippers to admission to the trading places, preventing a monopoly in the grain trade (the case against the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce). The commission has literally saved the public millions of dollars annually by the prevention of various fraudulent and misleading advertising and misbranding practices. The commission has protected hundreds of business men from the unfair practices of rivals whether practiced directly or through bogus independents.

In certain types of cases where the proposed respondent is willing to cease and desist the practice the commission accepts a stipulation in which the proposed respondent agrees not to indulge further in the practice complained of. From December 1, 1925, to June 30, 1931, such stipulations had been accepted in 837 instances. The commission also prevents certain forms of false and misleading advertising by accepting stipulations to cease and desist using such advertisements. From May 6, 1929, to June 30, 1931, stipulations had been accepted in 119 such matters, and 389 such cases had been handled.

As a result of the above activities of the commission the public has been saved millions of dollars.

In addition to the above statutes the commission is also charged with the duty of enforcing the so-called export trade act, and in accordance with this the commission has continually had supervision of the activities of between 50 and 60 export-trade associations involving annual exports of hundreds of millions of dollars. In 1929 the value of such exports was $724,100,000, and in 1930, $661,000,000. The commission has instituted under this act to June 30, 1931, 881 investigations, including foreign-trade inquiries, and disposed of 364 such investigations.

This work of the commission and 73 special investigations have been done with a maximum annual appropriation of $1,864,800, a minimum annual appropriation of $430,964, and an average annual appropriation of $1,174,317.42; a maximum annual number of employees of 663 for the war year 1918, a minimum annual number of employees of 214, and an average annual number of employees of 348.35.

The utility corporations' investigation is one of the largest undertaken by any Government department. It involves an investigation and study of the practices, organization, relationship, conduct, and management of utility corporations throughout the United States. The organization, management, and relationship of many of these corporations are quite complicated and complex. Some of the holding corporations have as many as 250 to 400 subsidiaries; and in order to trace the growth, development, and relationship of these various corporations it is necessary to review the books of these corporations for periods of from 10 to 20 years. There is involved an investigation and study of much of the same character of information for utilities as is required by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the railroads in its efforts to value the railroads, upon which that commission has been working for 19 years, and for which particular work there has been appropriated $40,506,234.91, considerably more than the total appropriations for the Federal Trade Commission during its entire existence. The electric and gas utility companies constitute an industry comparable in size to the national railway systems. The public utilities represent an investment of about $25,000,000,000 as compared with $26,000,000,000 invested in the railroads.

There are about 170 Portland-cement mills in the United States, located in 35 of the 48 States. The total production during 1930 was 643,620,000 sacks (94 pounds each). This production dropped to about 498,280,000 sacks in 1931.

For convenience in stating price reductions since the commission started the investigation of the cement industry, the United States has been divided into four sections, namely, (1) the northeastern section, including the States north of Virginia, and Tennessee, and east of the Mississippi River; (2) the southeastern section, including the States south of Kentucky, West Virginia, and Maryland, and east of the Mississippi River, also including Louisiana; (3) the central section, including the States west of the Mississippi River and east of the eastern boundary line of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico; (4) the Rocky Mountain Pacific section, including the States west of the central section. The total shipments by all mills in the United States during 1931 were approximately 505,860,000 sacks.

The consumption of cement in each of these four sections, as reflected by the shipments into the several States of each respective section, during 1931 was as follows:

	Barrels	Per cent
Northeastern and lake section	73,138,484	57.8
Southeastern section	14,433,563	11.4
Central section	25,849,691	20.5
Rocky Mountain Pacific section	12,183,824	9.6
Exports	387,486	.3
Territories	471,952	.4
	126,465,000	100.0

According to the Bureau of Mines, Department of Commerce reports, the net mill value of cement covering the entire United States declined from approximately $1.44 per barrel in 1930 to $1.12 per barrel in 1931, a reduction of 32 cents per barrel or 8 cents per sack. This figure reflects the reduction in prices put into effect during 1931. The net mill value of 1931, however, includes sales during the first part of the year, before the reductions became effective.

The mill base prices of cement at the various mills in the northeastern and lake section were reduced during 1931 subsequent to the beginning of the investigation of the cement industry by the commission from 40 cents per barrel at the mills in the Lehigh Valley to 75 cents per barrel at the silos in Cleveland, Ohio.

The mill base price at the mills in and around Birmingham, Ala., was reduced since the beginning of this investigation by 26 cents per barrel.

The mill base reductions in the central section during the investigation ranged from 44 cents per barrel at Iola, Kans., to 84 cents per barrel at Ada, Okla. No attempt has been made as yet to arrive at the average reduction in mill base prices in any of the above sections.

The commission has received direct from dealers throughout the United States the retail price per sack of cement in small quantities beginning with January, 1929, to and including the year 1931. In the northeastern and lake sections, which consumed approximately 73,000,000 barrels of cement, 57.8 per cent of the total consumption for the United States, reports show reductions in prices since the investigation began, ranging from 5 cents per sack in Buffalo, N. Y., to 30 cents per sack at Painesville, Ohio. These reports cover 33 locations in the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Twelve of these locations reported reductions of 20 cents or over per sack. Nine additional locations reported reductions of 15 cents or more per sack.

From the southeastern section, which consumed approximately 15,000,000 barrels, or 11.4 per cent of the total consumption of the United States during 1931, there are reports from only seven different locations, which show reductions in price since the investigation began, ranging from 4 cents per sack at Mobile, Ala., to 15 cents per sack at Knoxville, Tenn.

In the central section of the United States, as defined above, 33 different locations in the States of Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, and Minnesota show reductions in prices since the investigation began, ranging from no reduction at Norton, Kans., to 35 cents per sack at Leoti, Kans. Fifteen of the thirty-three locations showed reductions of 20 cents or more per sack. Seven additional locations showed reductions of 15 cents or more per sack. A dealer in Nebraska reports a reduction in the price per sack of 27 cents, 37½ per cent; a dealer in Michigan reports a reduction in the price per sack of 22 cents, 35 per cent; a dealer in Michigan reports a reduction of 21 cents per sack, 31 per cent; a dealer in Iowa reports a reduction of 15 cents per sack, 18¾ per cent; a dealer in Minnesota reports a reduction of 15 cents per sack, 18¾ per cent.

Reports from the retail dealers in the Rocky Mountain Pacific section are not complete. The general information, however, is that there were very slight reductions in prices to the small consumer in this section. However, the section consumed only approximately 12,000,000 barrels, or 9.6 per cent of the total consumption of the United States. No attempt has been made as yet to estimate the average reduction in the retail price of cement in any of the above-described sections of the United States.

The mill-base prices which are used by the manufacturers in determining the delivered price of cement for the mills east of the Rocky Mountains declined within a range of 26 cents per barrel for the Birmingham mills to 84 cents at Ada, Okla., and these reductions are reflected in the retail price of cement as noted above.

The study of discounts and allowances in the chain-store investigation has apparently led to the abolition of a large part of such and thus saved thousands of small independent merchants from being forced out of business.

The commission at present has on its pay roll 519 employees. Unless the commission is allowed this $360,000, in addition to the amount now carried in the bill, it will be necessary for the commission to discharge over 200 of these employees, over 38½ per cent.

ACTIVITIES IN NEBRASKA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, yesterday and to-day I have taken Senators all over the United States just giving brief glimpses here and there. Senators have noticed, or if they will think about it they will notice, that the so-called write-ups, this water that has been pumped into the capitalization of public-utility companies, is not common to one locality. Senators probably noticed when I read the list that it covered practically every nook and corner of the United States. It covers the whole country. The investigation is not yet completed. When it is completed it will be seen that there is hardly a locality or school district in the United States that is not affected by the unconscionable operations of the Power Trust. No one has been forgotten. It covers everybody and everything.

I want to conclude what I have to say by adding one more locality. I want now to take you, Mr. President, to my own State of Nebraska. I have taken as samples, and only as samples for the purpose of illustration, companies operating in various localities, and have shown what they have been doing. To some extent I want to do that in my own State, and I shall only touch the high spots there. I shall be able to show in this case, as I could show in almost every other case, that while they are pumping water into their corporations they are not forgetting anything else. They never forget anything. While they are changing water into gold they are not forgetting about politicians in school districts, in legislatures, in senatorial campaigns, in presidential campaigns. They have their men ready to write a platform from prohibition to declaration of war to suit any convention that wants to use it if they can keep out of that convention platform anything that might hurt them.

Mr. President, when we get to Nebraska the first thing we run up against is the Nebraska Power Co. It is the great representative there of the Electric Bond & Share Co., of Wall Street, New York. The Nebraska Power Co. was developed from the systems of the Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. and the Citizens' Gas & Electric Co., of Council Bluffs, which was a subsidiary of the Omaha company. The Council Bluffs company, now a subsidiary of the Nebraska Power Co., is known to-day as the Citizens' Power & Light Co. The Omaha and Council Bluffs companies together serve a population of about 214,000 in Omaha and 42,000 in Council Bluffs, and operate also in about 40 towns and rural territories within a radius of 50 miles of Omaha and within a radius of 25 miles of Council Bluffs in Iowa.

As a foundation for the financial manipulation which took place in the transfer of 1917 and since there are the extraordinary growth and the ample and sustained earning power of these Omaha and Council Bluffs utilities. The Nebraska Power Co. itself has acknowledged that its steady growth and financial success has been due in a considerable part to the foodstuffs industries in and about Omaha, which show a steady growth without violent fluctuations in periods of inflation or deflation. This is shown from a transcript of the Federal Trade Commission hearings, March 9, 1932, at page 19578.

In the 1917 transfer the value of the properties was written up over night by more than 100 per cent. To get the full significance of this "write up" it is necessary to go back some years into the early history of the Omaha utilities. Now over night—and this is from the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission—the capitalization had pumped into it 100 per cent of water and the next morning that was gold. When we go back we find that the writing up of the assets and the issuing of watered stock began very early, so that the inflated financial structure of 1917 was reared not upon a solid foundation of property or value but in large part upon water that had been pumped earlier into the old companies, as well as the new companies, which the Omaha council has imputed is "a most profligate issuing of stocks and bonds that represented no investment whatever."

Here is a sketch of what happened. The original electric plant was built in Omaha in 1885. It changed hands in 1889 and again in 1903. When the second transfer took place in 1903 an inventory was prepared indicating that the utility company itself valued its properties at that time at $794,000. Yet these properties changed hands with a capitalization of $1,201,000, as they passed out of the control of the old owners, and with a capitalization of $3,831,000 as they came into the control of the new owners. Just get that picture! In the first place they themselves admitted that the total valuation was only $794,000 when the original company sold it, but they sold it at a value of $1,201,000—quite a profit that was for one day—they sold it to another corporation, and the next day on the books of the new company the valuation was $3,831,000, showing that over night two transactions of converting water into gold had taken place.

It was the conviction of Omaha's mayor and city council, expressed in a rate decision years later, that even the $1,201,000 exceeded the value of the property; and these officials found that when the capitalization was boosted to $3,831,000, or more than 200 per cent, in 1903 not a stick nor a stone of property was added; not a single thing of value was added except 200 per cent of water. The additional securities were water. A utility baron of that city took them for his own when he acquired the control of an old company and transferred its properties to a new one headed by himself. His little deal was exceedingly profitable; for in later years, between 1903 and 1917, the new company's common stock, all "water," paid dividends as high as $600,000 a year—$600,000 annually for nothing. In those days even utility barons rated that as a pretty fair profit. (Exhibit 5038, appendix 10, sheet 5, of the Federal Trade Commission.)

At the same time that the fixed capital was written up and the watered stock was issued, apparently, the public-utility franchise which one of the old companies had obtained from the city of Omaha was put on the book as an asset having a value of $2,055,000, or more than three times the value of the company's tangible property as shown by its inventory, as shown by its own books. The franchise was greater in value than all the property they owned, as shown by their books; a franchise that, of course, did not cost a cent, a franchise that, as a matter of truth and honesty, belonged to the people of Omaha and not to the corporation.

The franchise was being carried on the books at this value when the Omaha system next changed hands in 1917.

When this transfer in 1917 took place the Omaha utility purported to have assets of $6,432,000, but, with the franchise value eliminated, the amount of the assets was only $4,377,000. It is by no means certain that they were worth even that much, because, as we have seen, the Omaha City Council believed that even before the franchise value was assigned, in 1903, the utility's assets were overvalued, and the old inventory bears this out. But the power barons who took hold in 1917 were not concerned with pools of "water" behind; their eyes were glued upon the rivers of "water" and the floods of profits ahead. They hurdled clear over the $4,377,000 assets value without the franchise, and the $6,432,000 assets value with the franchise, and set up a new value of $13,500,000.

That is "going some." The mighty Electric Bond & Share Co. had taken charge. The whole of the transfer deal of 1917 was engineered by this company, which controls one of the greatest of all the power systems in the country and has been in the forefront of every conflict between the Government and the power industry for years past.

The Electric Bond & Share Co. wished to obtain control of the power system centering around Omaha and to make this system a part of its own much greater system. This it accomplished, first, by buying up the common and preferred stocks of the Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. For those securities it paid, in one form or another, a total of $4,633,000. Then it took these same securities and sold them to one of its own subholding companies, the American Power & Light Co., for $5,865,000, netting a profit, in cash and stock, of $1,232,000. There was not any property added, Mr. President; it was the same property; they merely sold it to themselves and increased its value.

This sale need not be regarded very seriously as the American Power & Light Co. is, in fact, a sort of "paper" company, which is virtually identical with the Electric Bond & Share Co. itself; that is to say, it is staffed and officered by Electric Bond & Share; much of its controlling stock is held by Electric Bond & Share, and there are various other devices which make the union extraordinarily close. The American Power & Light Co., at any rate, paid the Electric Bond & Share for the Omaha securities by issuing demand notes and securities of its own and delivering them to the Electric Bond & Share Co. Then, being possessed of the securities of the old Omaha Co., the American Power & Light Co. turned them over to its new Nebraska Power Co. through a "dummy" and recapitalized the properties. In doing so it disregarded entirely the $4,377,000 which, be it remembered, was the amount of the assets with the franchise eliminated. It disregarded also the $4,633,000 which the Electric Bond & Share Co. had paid for the Omaha properties, the $5,865,000 which American Power & Light had paid to Electric Bond & Share for them, and the $6,432,000 purported fixed capital which appeared on the books of the old company. Instead of heeding any of these figures, it caused the new company to enter upon its books as fixed capital $13,500,000 and to issue its securities accordingly. This was accomplished merely by writing a new set of figures on the books.

The report of Examiner J. W. Adams, of the Federal Trade Commission, states explicitly that there was no change whatever in the amount or the character of the properties. All that happened was that the Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. closed its books on May 31, 1917, with a fixed capital of $6,432,000, and the Nebraska Power Co. opened its books the next day showing a fixed capital of $13,500,000. The difference, or write-up, was $7,068,000. Adding some write-up for the Council Bluff subsidiary, there was a total write-up of $7,387,000. On the 31st day of May, 1917, the corporation holding these properties in Omaha and vicinity was turned over to another corporation, and in the transaction, all of which was completed between the closing of one day's work and the opening of the next day's work, there was $7,387,000 of water pumped into the capitalization of that company, upon which the people of Omaha and vicinity will be paying revenue through all time unless some remedy in some way may be provided to rectify the condition.

The whole procedure was not only unsupported by any additions to plants or equipment; but it appears to have been entirely arbitrary. As in many other such deals, the commission found no record of any appraisal of the properties. They did not even pretend to have an excuse; they just wrote that much water in the valuation on their books the next morning after the transfer had been made.

Against the "paper" addition to assets of $7,387,000, the promoters "wrote up" the company's surplus $177,000. Substantially all the rest of the increase was made the basis for new securities. Where $3,789,600 securities had been outstanding, exclusive of the big bond issues, the new company issued $10,999,500. (Transcript, March 10, p. 19693.)

Substantially all these securities were delivered to the American Power & Light Co. A large portion of them was handed on by this company to the public. From $5,500,000 of the Nebraska Power Co. securities, the American Power & Light Co. realized at the time of the transfer, or thereafter, more than $5,000,000. It took, for itself, $5,000,000 of the Nebraska Power Co.'s common stock. Since it paid for the Omaha properties, technically, the $5,865,000, and got back more than $5,000,000 of this through the sale of securities, the American Co.'s books should indicate cost to it, for the Nebraska Co.'s common stock, of about $766,000, but what the books show here is not the real truth.

The technical cost to the American Co. of the Omaha properties, $5,865,000, included the profit of $1,232,000 to the Electric Bond & Share Co., and the deal which gave rise to this profit was merely one between the left hand and the right hand.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to remark that that was rather a conservative rake-off, was it not? That was not customary; that was only about one-third of what is usual, and that would seem to represent an improvement.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably they had taken such a big rake-off before that they were ashamed to do the same thing again so soon afterwards.

Mr. LONG. A profit of two or three times that size would be customary.

Mr. NORRIS. The deal which gave rise to this profit was one merely between the right hand and the left hand. The Electric Bond & Share Co., the American Power & Light Co. and the Nebraska Power Co. were, for all practical purposes, a single entity. Their real nature is best illustrated by the fact that a law firm in Augusta, Me., which looks after the incorporation of Electric Bond & Share enterprises and votes their stock by proxy, voted all the stock of all three companies at each stockholders' meeting.

We must remember they are incorporated over in Maine to do business in Nebraska.

When we eliminate the $1,232,000 profit to the Electric Bond & Share Co. on the "sale" of the Omaha properties to its own subholding company their cost was only $4,633,000. Then, since the American Power & Light Co. realized more than $5,000,000 from its security sales, it actually profited by approximately $466,000 besides retaining for itself the $5,000,000 of common stock at no cost. (Transcript, March 10, p. 19702.)

The results were:

First, the expenses of the Omaha acquisition were paid.

Second, the Electric Bond & Share took a profit of $1,232,000 upon the sale of the Omaha properties to its subholding company, the American Power & Light Co.

Third, over and above these expenses and this profit there was an excess capitalization of $5,000,000 or more, which was utilized for the issuance of a huge block of common stock to the American Power & Light Co. at no cost, and, in fact, with a cash profit to that company on the side.

It is this huge block of common stock which has brought the greatest profit to the controlling interests, and which has chiefly served to drain off the excess earnings of the Omaha property, which means its excess collections from the consumers. This is clearly shown in the dividend records of the Nebraska Power Co. during the 12 years from 1917 to 1928.

In these 12 years there was paid in dividends a total of $7,663,000. Of this total, $4,075,000 was paid in dividends on the common stock alone, and virtually all of this common stock was held by the American Power & Light Co., which, as I have pointed out, is all but identical with the Electric Bond & Share Co. Therefore, say the Trade Commission's reports, the indications are that "practically all the $4,075,000 paid went to the American Power & Light Co." (Exhibit 5038, p. 194.) And remember that all these dividends were paid as a return on a supposed investment which was in reality no investment at all.

The holding company's pickings have grown richer from year to year. In 1924, these common-stock dividends amounted to only $367,000 a year; but by 1927 they had grown to $741,000, and by 1930 to $1,200,000 a year.

It may be wondered how profits so extravagant can be piled up on stock which is nothing but water. There are several very compelling reasons for this.

In the first place, there is the part played by the investor who is permitted by the promoting and controlling interests to put up all or nearly all of the money which is actually needed, either to take over properties or to expand them.

A second factor in making possible the huge profits is the phenomenal increase in the use of electricity. Between 1918 and 1930, the Nebraska Power Co.'s production increased about 325 per cent. Thus, even if the cost of producing electricity had remained the same, the company could have made larger and larger profits from year to year.

But the cost, in fact, went down sharply, thus providing a third factor leading to increase of profits. In the same period, from 1918 to 1930, the average generating cost declined from approximately three-quarters of a cent per kilowatt-hour to a little more than a third of a cent per kilowatt-hour. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19617.) Other costs also declined. The total expense per kilowatt-hour for both generation and distribution, including taxes and depreciation as well as uncollected bills, dropped from 2.23 cents in 1920 to 1.24 cents in 1930.

The reasons for this sharp decline in costs were several. Because of the increased production there was a more continuous utilization of equipment. The equipment itself became more efficient. Accordingly the consumption of coal per kilowatt-hour was cut in half. The price of coal declined sharply, and likewise the prices of supplies needed for the power plants. Then the new machinery proved so efficient that, instead of using more labor as the production increased, the company actually used less labor. During the period from 1920 to 1930, for example, when production increased 180 per cent, the number of employees declined 5.6 per cent, or from 124 to 117.

The vast savings which were made possible by all these factors were not, of course, monopolized entirely by the power company. It was necessary to reduce rates somewhat, although some of the reductions were made by the company against its will. At any rate, when the total expense of generation and distribution was declining from 2.23 cents to 1.24 cents per kilowatt-hour between 1920 and 1930, the average selling price of current to all classes of consumers dropped from 2.90 cents to 2.27 cents.

The Trade Commission's examiners even concede that by and large the savings in production and distribution costs were passed on to the consumers; but they point out that there were further large savings in financing which were not passed on at all. These savings were made possible by the financing of new construction, made necessary by the big increase in production and sales, by means of bonds and preferred stocks, which carried moderate rates of interest.

The effect of these savings due to declining costs and financing at low rates of interest, and the failure of the company to pass on more than a limited part of these savings to the consumers, is more clearly shown in an analysis the commission has made of the distribution of the consumer's dollar. Since the reorganization of 1917, the proportion of this dollar absorbed by production and distribution expenses, by interest, and by dividends on preferred stock has shown a "marked decrease." During the same time there has been a "marked increase" in the portion of this consumer's dollar going into common-stock dividends and surplus. The result is that whereas in 1918 common-stock dividends and surplus absorbed only 3.58 cents of each dollar, by 1930 they were absorbing 22.77 cents, or nearly a fourth of every dollar the consumer paid in.

In newspaper accounts of the Trade Commission hearings there were cited rates of return on the common stock held by the holding company ranging up to 338 per cent. Such a rate of return appears fantastic, but a close examination of the commission's reports shows that even this figure is in a sense an understatement. To compute the rate of return it was necessary to credit the holding company with an equity in the common stock; and, although the company has such an equity from the accounting standpoint, this equity results entirely from an accumulation of the company's surplus earnings. It does not represent money which the holding company itself has furnished but money which consumers have paid in, and which the company has permitted to remain in the enterprise over and above the amount it has drawn out in common-stock dividends.

From 1917 to 1926 there was no equity whatever behind the common stock, according to the commission's studies. Since then, as the accountants put it, "the entire common-stock equity has been built up from earnings carried to surplus." (Transcript, March 9, p. 19638.)

Now, turning from the returns on the common stock to the return on the actual investment in the property, so far as this investment could be computed by the Trade Commission, we find that between 1923 and 1928 the total investment ranged from $12,500,000 to $18,500,000. In not one of these years from 1923 to 1928 was the return on investment less than 12 per cent. In 1928 it rose to 13.4 per cent. (Exhibit 5038, p. 237.)

These percentages appear conservative because, while the commission in computing investment excluded the "write-up" of 1917, it had no means of determining accurately the investment in early years, and therefore was compelled to accept certain book figures.

The power companies gave no help in digging deeper for facts. Both at Omaha and in New York, commission examiners were told that records of the predecessor company had been misplaced or destroyed, although the company produced them in Omaha in 1920 when they were needed to further its application for an increase in rates. (Transcript, March 10, pp. 19684–19685 and Exhibit 5038, p. 172.)

The probable truth is, Mr. President, that the figures I have given are much too conservative. The facts are that the Federal Trade Commission have never been able to get to the bottom of it. They do not know themselves, from their investigations, all of the write-ups. They can not tell, from their investigations, how much water has been pumped into these securities in the past.

The power companies say that the books are lost; that they are not able to find the records. They evidently have been destroyed, although when they wanted to use them for their own purposes in 1920 they found no difficulty in finding them.

FEES

Now, about the fees:

The approximately $4,000,000 which the Electric Bond & Share interests have taken out of the Nebraska Power Co. in common-stock dividends without making an investment do not represent all the profit accruing to these interests. They have profited also through fees imposed upon the local company by the Electric Bond & Share Co., and by commissions on the sale of the local company's securities. From 1918 to 1930, these fees and commissions amounted to $1,431,000. The fees were imposed for supervision of operations and of management, for financing, for construction work and for "special services." The construction fees the commission has already found to be practically clear profit.

The collecting of them is scarcely more than a racket for bringing additional profits into the holding company's treasury. As to the fees as a whole, there is less known, but the commission has established that there is a big profit in them without being able to determine its exact extent. Neither my constituents in Nebraska nor I as a Member of the United States Senate am permitted to know the amount of this profit. When the trade commission made its first power investigation half a dozen years ago, pursuant to a resolution I introduced, the Electric Bond & Share Co. assured the trade commission that these fees were nonprofit making. In the present power investigation, under Senator WALSH's resolution, the commission has stated that this claim is false and that there is a substantial profit in fees. But when the commission sought to examine the records which would show the extent of the profit, the Electric Bond & Share Co. refused to yield access to these records. Its attorney stated that they would not disclose matters which were "wholly private and confidential." It has tied up the trade commission in the courts for three years. The commission is about to get a decision in this case, and probably to get the records also, if it is allowed sufficient funds to complete its investigation.

The fees paid to the Electric Bond & Share Co. by local companies are provided for in contracts which must be approved by the local companies' directors. For this and other financial reasons, and for political reasons as well, the directorships are important.

LOCAL SUPPORT

For its Nebraska Power Co. directorate, the Electric Bond & Share interests have installed not only a half dozen of their men, who quite evidently run the local company, under directions from New York, but nine of the most prominent business men in Omaha. These local business men may not have much work to do, because a majority of the officers, and two out of three members of the executive committee, are connected with Electric Bond & Share interests higher up. But they are securely tied to the company and, along with them, all the influence they command in Omaha and the surrounding country.

Listen to this, speaking of the Nebraska Power Co.: Each of these local men is permitted to buy 5,000 shares of Nebraska Power Co. stock at 50 cents a share. On his $2,500 investment each one of these men collects dividends amounting to from $6,000 to $6,500 a year.

That ought to keep them sweet. That ought to keep the local fellows good to the foreign companies in this great concern doing business in Omaha. That means from 240 to 260 per cent on the investment. Each time one of them attends a directors' meeting he is paid $30. When he retires, his stock is repurchased at a price 150 per cent in excess of cost, which nets him a parting profit of $3,750.

I wonder whether the people of Omaha and Nebraska comprehend really what that all means, how a few of their prominent citizens are given directorships where they have nothing to do except to say "amen" to what the bosses in New York tell them. All the thing is for is to sweeten the corporation in the eyes of the great consuming public in Nebraska, who have to pay the bills, and the prominent men are given these important positions in order that their influence may go out over the country and the surrounding towns and keep the people quiet. Each one of them is permitted to purchase this stock at 50 cents a share, and when they retire it is repurchased at $1.50 a share. That makes a clear profit of $3,750. In the meantime, when they meet with the board of directors and are given a few high-priced cigars to smoke, and perhaps something else, they get $30. On the investment they have been permitted to make they get a rate of return of from 240 to 260 per cent.

Dividends netting a return of 160 per cent on the cost of the stock were paid in the years 1927 and 1928, after smaller but handsome and constantly increasing dividends had been paid to local directors in earlier years. The commission listed as directors in 1928: Joseph Barker, Thomas B. Coleman, Harley G. Conant, Gould Dietz, A. W. Gordon, Dan A. Johnson, John W. Welch, Glen C. Wharton, and Fred E. Hovey, president of the Stockyards National Bank.

The six directors belonging more particularly to the Electric Bond & Share wing were: W. W. Head, chairman of the Nebraska Power Co. and chairman of the Omaha National Bank; James E. Davidson, president of the Nebraska Power Co.; Roy Page, then assistant general manager of the company and now its vice president and general manager; J. A. C. Kennedy, company counsel; A. S. Grenier; and C. E. Groesbeck. Grenier is an Electric Bond & Share Co. man and Groesbeck was then an officer and director of Electric Bond & Share and American Power & Light, and is now president of the Electric Bond & Share Co.

Not all of these more active directors figured in the stock ownership plan in which the local business men were allowed participation. Two company officers, who may have been directors, held similar blocks of stock in 1929 and 1930. Four directors of the Council Bluffs subsidiary also were let in. (Transcript, March 22, p. 20220.)

Mr. Davidson has come to the commission's attention before. Prior to scrutinizing high finance as it has been practiced in the Nebraska Power Co., the commission learned how the power magnates "doctored" school books and wrote new ones of their own. This Mr. Davidson, who is president of the Nebraska Power Co., is also one of the gentlemen who wants to alter our educational system. He says it is not fair. A few years ago, when he was president of the National Electric Light Association, he wrote a friendly little letter, telling just what he thought. It reads:

NATIONAL ELECTRIC LIGHT ASSOCIATION,
Omaha, Nebr., August 15, 1925.

Mr. FRED R. JENKINS,
Chairman Educational Committee,
National Electric Light Association, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. JENKINS: I have read with a great deal of interest your letter of July 1, and also those of August 11 and 12 to Mr. Aylesworth about the work of the educational committee, doing everything possible to right the unfortunate situation that now exists in having textbooks that are in the hands of pupils of the schools containing erroneous and unfair information about the economics of our business and particularly those pertaining to electric light and power companies, their financial matters, operations, and policies.

I was very much surprised when I read Mr. GILCHRIST's report on this condition. I think your idea is very good of having Dean Heilman handle this matter. It is fortunate, too, that Mr. Mullaney will also help.

You have my very best wishes for a successful result in the very important work which you are undertaking.

Very truly yours,

J. E. DAVIDSON, President.

(Part 4, Exhibit No. 2540, p. 912.)

Mr. President, I think most of the Senators will remember that this letter is only a part of the great propaganda that was undertaken by the Power Trust to change the textbooks in our public schools, under the guise of some other reason, to get their agents to become friendly with the Boy Scouts, to get into the schools, to have things taught in the schools that would be friendly toward the idea held by the great Power Trust.

I remember that it was shown in the investigation that they circulated in some of the schools of New England a catechism, working carefully, through various ingenious means, teaching the school children that they must look with horror upon any such thing as public ownership of a public utility like an electric-light plant; lecturers telling the children, and telling the teachers, some of whom were employed on the side at salaries paid by the power company, to put the poison of the electric-power influences into the minds of the growing children of the United States.

This letter of Mr. Davidson is simply a part of the program. He says that the textbooks in the hands of the pupils contain erroneous information. Of course, they give that as a reason. The real reason is that they want to write the textbooks for the children, as the evidence developed by the Federal Trade Commission that if they could get their influence into the minds of the young, while they were forming their minds, while they were schoolboys and schoolgirls, they would grow up to be men and women friendly to the ideas of the Power Trust.

I remember that in that investigation something happened in regard to the secretary of a State press association who was doing a lot of work quietly for the Power Trust, sending out letters on which they paid the postage, for which they paid the expense, trying to poison the minds of the people against municipally owned electric-light plants. This Davidson letter is a part of it all.

NYE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION IN NEBRASKA

Mr. President, I think I ought to digress here to make a remark or two about one or two of the prominent men in the Nebraska Power Co. who were allowed to get this stock at the low rate and sell it at the high rate and get these fabulous dividends. One of them was Walter Head. Who is Walter Head? He is the financial genius of the Missouri Valley. For a while he had headquarters at Omaha. He is a personal friend of Herbert Hoover, President of the United States. The Nye committee, when they were investigating campaign expenditures last year, ran on to his tracks out in Nebraska. They had a long siege of it before they traced him down. Walter Head was then connected with one of the big banks in Chicago. He had formerly lived in Omaha and operated the Omaha National Bank. He controlled or was supposed to control the financial operations of all the banks of the State. To a great extent he took care of the politics of the State. On the face of it he was a Republican, but always for the power companies first. He financed a good many operations.

The Nye committee put on the witness stand a man by the name of Victor Seymour. It had been reported to the committee that Seymour had been actively engaged in looking after the senatorial campaign in Nebraska. He went on the stand and under oath explicitly denied all knowledge of any connection with politics. He had nothing to do with it. He did not know anything about a bogus grocery man who disgraces the name I bear, who had been put into the campaign as a competitor of mine. He knew nothing about it. All he knew was what he saw in the papers, and I think the committee believed him, but it later developed that it was all false. It later developed that he had an office there and did not do anything else but politics, that he had his men all over the State canvassing. He was engaged exclusively and entirely in the senatorial campaign. It was recognized that he must have had considerable money to carry on that kind of an operation. The investigation kept on, came to Washington, went back again to Chicago, and back again to Washington, Walter Head knowing all the time what was going on and that they were trying to find out who furnished the money for Victor Seymour.

Finally the Nye committee got it so close to Walter Head that when he knew he was going to be disclosed he came to the witness stand and admitted it. In order to put himself right before the people he told before the committee what he was. Everybody in Nebraska knew it before. He was chairman, or a member, at least, of the board of directors of some of the great railroad companies of the United States. He was head of the Boy Scout movement. He was chairman of the board of the Nebraska Power Co., and that is where he comes into this case. Incidentally he might have told them that he had the reputation—which I presume was purposely circulated over the State years before when he wanted to control the politics of the State—of being teacher of the biggest Sunday school in the State—a very religious man, running the Boy Scout movement; but incidentally it developed that he had put up several thousand dollars of money for Mr. Seymour, the man who had already committed perjury. He knew Seymour had done that. He saw the committee go from one end of the country to the other trying to find out the truth about it. He remained silent, this great Christian Sunday-school teacher.

He is one of the men who at that very time—I presume it was within those dates—was drawing these fabulous sums from the Nebraska Power Co. The people of Nebraska did not know it then. Nobody suspected that this great Sunday-school man, this great Boy Scout Christian, was engaged with Victor Seymour in the disreputable business in which he was engaged. But he admitted under oath that he had furnished four or five thousand dollars of money to Victor Seymour. He said it was his own money. Oh, no; it was not paid by the power company! But the evidence before the Federal Trade Commission shows that he was getting a rake-off from the Nebraska Power Co. of thousands of dollars which honestly, morally, and rightfully was not his money. He did nothing to earn it—nothing, at least, that was legitimate. So he was connected up with the matter.

I might say incidentally in passing that this man Victor Seymour was indicted for perjury committed before the Nye committee. He is as clearly guilty of perjury as any man in the civilized world has ever been guilty of perjury. He testified point blank that he knew nothing about the transactions, when, as a matter of fact, he was behind them from beginning to end, and it was afterwards disclosed and proven that he was. Even Walter Head's own testimony shows what the man's business was.

Here is a peculiar thing. This man Victor Seymour has no money. That is not to his discredit, and I am not mentioning it for that reason. I only mention it to show that as a matter of fact if he relied upon his own financial responsibility he could not hire the lawyers who had been engaged in his defense. Who are they? This shows the bipartisan condition of many of these great combinations. First, one attorney who is representing him is chairman of the Nebraska Democratic central committee and another attorney is, I believe, ex-chairman of the Republican State central committee, the heads as it were, of the two great political parties of Nebraska. They are both fine men, I have not a thing against either one of them. Both are good lawyers, but in my judgment neither one of them was employed on account of his legal ability. Neither one of them could have been employed by Victor Seymour. I venture the assertion without fear of any contradiction from any reliable source that Victor Seymour never did employ either one of them. They were employed for their political influence more than their legal ability, although they have legal ability and political influence both. They were employed for the same reason that ex-Senator Lenroot was employed by the Power Trust to appear before the senatorial committee in their behalf—not because of his legal ability, but because of his supposed political influence.

This man Victor Seymour could not get to first base in paying an attorney fee to either one of the men who were employed for him. They have gone out of their way in the litigation. They have tried every avenue of escape for this perjurer. They have had the case considered on some technicality which they tried to find in the indictment. It was taken to the court of appeals on that technicality. They have had habeas corpus proceedings tried in the Federal courts. They carried it to the next higher court, being defeated both times. The expenses of those attorneys, without any fees, would be much more than Mr. Seymour has ever been worth in all his lifetime.

The indictment was quashed the first time on some technicality. He was reindicted and they made motions to quash and filed demurrers and resorted to every legal technicality known to the legal mind, and still were unsuccessful. They finally went to trial and the jury disagreed, and that is where, perhaps, the wisdom of selecting these attorneys was shown. The jury stood 11 to 1 for conviction of this perjurer and, of course, that meant that the jury had to be discharged.

Who employed these great men at the head of the great political parties, using their wonderful influence and their legal ability for a man who has not a dollar? Who hired these lawyers? Who paid these lawyers their fees and their expenses? Echo answers "Who?" I hurl the question into the face of Walter Head, the personal friend of Herbert Hoover, who put several thousand dollars of his money into Victor Seymour's hands. Let him answer. Let these attorneys answer if they dare. Walter Head is shown here, by the evidence I have produced, as getting an enormous rake-off from the Nebraska Power Co., posing as a Sunday-school teacher, and furnishing his money to this perjurer to carry on his disreputable business.

J. B. WOOTAN'S LETTER

But, Mr. President, that was not quite all. I have here a copy of a letter written by J. B. Wootan. He is connected with the publication of a Power Trust magazine in Chicago. He wrote to his friend Brown in Lincoln, Nebr., while the investigation was going on, after the primary and while the election contest was going on. Brown is the representative of the Power Trust in the State. This letter was written during the campaign. I got hold of it. It has always been a mystery how I got it. I read it from the rostrum in a public speech that I made in that campaign. Many people went into hysterics the next day when it was published.

The man to whom it was directed, the power-company tool, immediately got on his high horse and said he was going to have me prosecuted for interfering with the mails; that it must be that I must have robbed the mails to get that letter. He was going to have an investigation from Washington at once and "have Senator NORRIS arrested for robbing the mails." I read the letter again at the next meeting after he made that charge and defied him to go ahead with his investigation. He did. I have had representatives of the Secret Service of the Department of Justice at Washington calling on me asking questions about the letter. They seem to take for granted that I have gone into the post office and broken into the mail and robbed it of this precious letter.

Part of the letter refers to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], but the tone of the letter shows what the Power Trust wanted to happen in Nebraska in the senatorial campaign. I think they are hunting yet to find out how I got that letter, and it is so interesting to see them hunt, it is so interesting to see them all get worked up about it, that I have never told them [laughter], although I could do it very easily and it would be very simple. No one has ever denied anything the letter contained, oh, no; but the means by which it was obtained is still a mystery to them. I read:

DEAR BROWN: Our mutual friend Arthur Huntington, of Cedar Rapids, has just been in my office and given me a most interesting bit of news, and I want to know from you if you think it would justify me in running out to Nebraska and getting this matter first hand in such shape, if possible, as to enable us to publish it.

He is the publisher of a Power Trust magazine in Chicago.

The thing is this—

He says—

Huntington says that either Senator NYE or one of his confederates in the snooping business demanded of one of the hotels of Lincoln the privilege of tapping such telephone wires in the hotel as he might desire and doing this in the name of the United States Government. The manager of the hotel is reported to have replied that he would be willing to have this done provided NYE or his confederates would bring mandamus suit to compel him to do it, whereupon the matter was dropped, and NYE was out of town in five hours. If this thing can be verified to make it safe for publication, it seems to me it ought to be done. It looks as though it is a corking good newspaper story, and possibly it has been published; I don't know. At any rate, write me and let me know what you think about it. Meantime—

And this is the real crux of it all—

Meantime, has Hitchcock any chance whatever of beating NORRIS? I wish I could think so, but from all the information I have been able to gather it looks dubious.

I am, with kind regards, yours truly,

J. B. WOOTAN.

Of course, the fairy tale to which he refers about what happened to Senator NYE is all made out of the whole cloth; but it shows how anxious this Power Trust sheet was to get hold of something that it could publish. The writer of the letter was willing to come to Nebraska if he could be assured of getting facts that would make it safe to publish that falsehood and that lie. Then he showed where his heart was in the last paragraph of the letter and where the heart of the great Power Trust was and is now.

Mr. President, the Nye committee remained there and brought out evidence that startled the whole country. It showed that there was a conspiracy to prevent the voters of a great Commonwealth from having the right to express themselves on the senatorial candidate and that it was one of the most disgraceful episodes in the history of American politics.

The Nye committee remained there and developed the facts, and the answer to the insinuations in that letter all came from the evidence when the Nye committee showed that Victor Seymour had been planted in the capital, had rented an office, employed a stenographer, and had a whole lot of men traveling over the State, and that he was doing it secretly, under the guise of doing something else; that he himself had prepared a written statement for the bogus Norris to issue when he came out in the campaign; that he was the author of it and that it was written in his own handwriting. Yet on the witness stand he denied he had ever heard of it until he saw it in the newspapers; he denied that he had had anything to do with anybody's campaign, and said that he had not spent a dollar in any activity of this kind. He stands now indicted for perjury, and if justice shall have its way he will eventually be looking through the bars. There can be no escape.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What connection did Mr. Lucas, the executive head of the Republican National Committee, have with reference to stirring up this man Seymour?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Lucas was not connected directly with Seymour. He was connected with another occurrence almost as disgraceful in connection with the Nebraska election, but I have not gone into that because there is not any connection between Walter Head and Lucas, so far as I know. Walter Head is connected with the Power Trust.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want simply to observe that I followed the Senator's progress in the campaign in Nebraska with a great deal of interest. I wanted to see him elected; I was reading all I could in the press at the time, and I had obtained the impression somewhere in some way that this man Lucas had been using the powers of his office to encompass the defeat of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all true. I think the means which he used were as disgraceful or almost as disgraceful as those which were used when they tried to put the bogus man with the same name in the campaign.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator. Both of them aroused my utter condemnation and scorn as political performances. I thought both proceedings absolutely disgraceful.

Mr. NORRIS. The story of the way Lucas was found out by the Nye committee, while not directly—and that is the reason I am not going into it, because it is not directly connected with the subject I am discussing—is just as interesting, and it shows the most disgraceful and obnoxious methods used by Lucas to cover up his tracks, to conceal his methods. to conceal the use of money, methods just as bad as anything that ever occurred anywhere else in anybody's campaign.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to mention this fact: The Senator from Nebraska was up for election at the same time I was in the State of Louisiana. I had been nominated by the Democratic Party, and when the Republican organization was carrying on its nonpartisan move against the candidate of its own party I was given to understand that an attack might be made on my nomination by the Democrats in the September primary because I had spoken over the radio and said that the Senator from Nebraska should be returned to this body, and he was not a member of my party.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator very much, and I may add that the great Power Trust is no respecter of parties. They do not care for the Republican Party or the Democratic Party or the Socialist Party or the Communist Party or any other party. They would do anything to get—that is what they are after—to get anybody who will do their bidding. He is the man they will support, and the evidence taken by the Federal Trade Commission shows that to be so. They prepare speeches for Democrats and speeches for Republicans to be delivered. They can condemn the Republican Party in as severe terms as any Democrat of the worst type would want them to do. They will fix it up to order, if you want them to, and they will do the same for the other party.

Mr. LONG. Is it not a matter of common knowledge that they planted their henchmen and tried to make two of them nominees of the Democratic Party in Chicago, one of them the head of the General Electric, Mr. Owen D. Young, and the other a lawyer from Cleveland, and tried to deadlock that convention and put them over on the party—heads I win and tails you lose—and before the people at the November election?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, they do all those things; that is part of their business; they always employ somebody to do it; somebody like Walter Head, for instance, who they can say is the head of the Boy Scout movement, who teaches Sunday School every Sunday, who asks a blessing at his table at every meal—a great, prayerful man—that is the kind of man they want to use. And when they want a fellow to handle the underworld they get the type they want to do that. It does not make any difference to them—politics or anything else.

Walter W. Head financed the senatorial survey of 1930 and got a slice of the big profits of the Electric Bond & Share people provided by it for local directors during both 1929 and 1930. As a director of the Nebraska Power Co. he held 5,000 shares of the Nebraska Power Co. stock which he had been permitted to buy for $2,500—50 cents a share. His dividend on this $2,500 investment amounted to $6,500 in 1929 and $6,000 in 1930. The official statement of this profit is given in testimony of Examiner Meleen before the Trade Commission of March 22, 1932. Here is a quotation from his testimony:

> In 1929 dividends were paid of $1.30 per share, which, in the case of 5,000 shares. amounts to $6,500, a return of 260 per cent. In 1930 dividends were paid of $1.20 per share, and amounted to $6,000 on 5,000 shares, or a return of 240 per cent.

That is what Walter Head got according to the transcript, March 22, pages 20215 and 20216. That is Walter Head, the Sunday-school man; Walter Head, the Boy Scout man; and through it all and in it all and with it all a Power Trust man.

NEBRASKA POWER CO.

Besides the profits accumulated through dividends and through fees imposed upon the subsidiary companies for supervision, construction, and the like, the Electric Bond & Share Co. interests, profits through the commissions on sales of securities, and besides this direct profit, they control the use of large amounts of subsidiary company funds for extended periods.

We have been told that one of the great advantages of a utility company being under the wing of a giant holding company is economy in borrowing money. Let us see how it works out. Properly done, I think, that would be true; in theory it is all right; if an honest man managed it, it would be all right; but here is the way it works out:

In the reorganization of 1917 the Nebraska Power Co. issued $1,500,000 of notes along with other securities. These notes were to run for 10 years. They bore an interest rate of 5 per cent. Through them this Omaha company was obtaining the use of money at 5 per cent and had the right to continue doing so for 10 years; but instead of doing so the controlling interest caused $400,000 of these notes to be retired only two years after they were issued by means of refinancing. The notes contained no provision for this, but the holder of them was the controlling holding company, and this company wanted cash. The bond issue which was used for the refinancing bore interest at the rate of 5 per cent like the notes, but when the bankers' discount, the commission of the Electric Bond & Share Co., and the expenses of the issue were deducted from the proceeds the real interest rate, or what the accountants call the effective interest rate, became 6.64 per cent.

There is an illustration, Mr. President. They already had money at 5 per cent that they had a right to keep for 10 years; but they took it out and borrowed money, nominally at the same rate, but the effect of the commission they had to pay made the new rate of interest nearly 7 per cent, all of which the consumers of electricity had to pay. The profit went to the holding company. The profit went to those who controlled the Electric Bond & Share Co.

Again, three years later, in 1922, the remaining $1,100,000 of these notes were retired, again by refinancing. This time the refinancing was accomplished through an issue of 6 per cent debentures, on which the real or effective rate of interest amounted to 7.49 per cent. They owed over $1,000,000, drawing 5 per cent, that was not due for about five years. They took it up and paid it, and to do it they borrowed the money. and they paid a rate of interest of 7.49 per cent to get that money to make the payment. Those are the people of efficiency! They are the people who we are told can run the big business of this country with great efficiency. That is efficiency for you! That is where monopoly becomes efficient. That is where the power trust shines—in that kind of efficiency. But the poor devil at the bottom who is paying for his electricity, the poor woman who is earning her money sewing at night by an electric lamp is paying the bill that all these millionaires slipped down into their pockets as profit.

The additional cost represented by the higher interest rate in these two instances amounted to $33,950 a year for this one company, a total of $180,000. Thus high rates of interest were substituted for low rates of interest in one instance eight years before it appears to have been necessary to refinance; in another instance five years before it appears to have been necessary to refinance. The subsidiary in Nebraska had to assume the burden of the higher interest rates.

If this looks like holding-company exploitation, consider the next instance cited by the Trade Commission.

Some years ago the Nebraska Power Co. issued $1,100,000 of general mortgage gold bonds. Money rates were high at that time, and the bonds bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent. It would seem that to pay so high a rate the Nebraska Co. must have needed money badly; but from the records and the correspondence obtained by the Federal Trade Commission investigators it appears that the Nebraska Power Co. did not need money at all. It was the holding company that needed it. The Nebraska Power Co. did not even know—I wish Senators would listen to this—that it was borrowing any money until it was told about it by the Electric Bond & Share Co.

On June 10, 1921, the Electric Bond & Share Co. notified the Nebraska Power Co. by a letter that the Nebraska Power Co. was floating a loan in the principal sum of $1,100,000.

It was being credited on the books of the holding company with $951,500 as the estimated proceeds of the loan; and its account was being so credited as of May 1, 1921, or about 40 days before the Nebraska Power Co. heard anything about the deal.

Think of that, Mr. President! Oh, that is efficiency! Oh, that is the way private business can operate public utilities! So efficient! It is not affected by the dead hand of Government ownership. There is no socialism in it. There is no bolshevism in it. There is no communism in it. It is all pure, private efficiency, private ability.

Here is a holding company in New York which wanted some money. How much was it? Well, let us see. I think it was something over a million dollars—$1,100,000—that they wanted; so they said, "Well, here, we will just have the Nebraska Power Co. borrow that for us. We own them. They are incorporated under the laws of Maine. We will send up there and tell the representative up there to have the Nebraska Power Co. borrow $1,100,000."

So it is done. The Nebraska Power Co., away out in Nebraska, plodding along with the farmers and the merchants, did not know anything about it. They did not know that they had borrowed $1,100,000. They had no idea about it. So from Wall Street the Electric Bond & Share Co. writes a letter and says, "Why, do not you know, you have borrowed some money? You have borrowed $1,100,000. You have given your notes for it, and we credit you on our books for those notes." "How much?" "Nine hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred dollars."

So the poor Nebraska Power Co. borrowed money when it did not want it, borrowed money that it never got, borrowed money amounting to $1,100,000, and was given credit on the books of the Electric Bond & Share Co. in New York for only $951,500. The balance was expense—selling their own loan, buying their own loan. They sold it for the Nebraska Power Co., and they bought it for themselves, and they charged them the difference between $1,100,000 and $951,500 for that work—for buying some bonds for themselves and getting the money themselves. Fine work! That is efficiency!

If a public utility owned by a little municipality should do such a thing as that, what would happen? Why, we would charter a vessel at once, and put the perpetrators on it, and send them over to Russia without opportunity to say goodbye to their wives. We would not stand for such an unpatriotic thing. But these men, these Sunday-school superintendents, these Boy Scout leaders, will borrow money, and they will saddle the burden upon the poor, downtrodden people who are paying all the money and all the expense of this outrageous and inhuman and unjustifiable conduct of millionaire monopolists.

Well, the Nebraska Power Co. found out that they had borrowed this money and they found out how much credit they were getting down in New York and Wall Street. They were notified in June that they had borrowed some money and that the Electric Bond & Share Co. had sold the bonds for them, and they had it, and they had given the Nebraska Power Co. credit for $951,500 as of May 1. That was kind. That not only showed great ability but it showed great honesty and kindness and consideration for the poor devil at the other end of the line who has to pay the bill.

Their account was so credited as of May 1, 1921, or about 40 days before the Nebraska Power Co. heard anything about the deal. Meanwhile the American Power & Light Co., the subholding company for Electric Bond & Share, had issued and sold, partly on the security of these bonds which the Nebraska Power Co. had not known it was going to issue, $3,500,000 of its own gold bonds. It was not until June 20 that the Nebraska Power Co. bonds were authorized by the Nebraska Power Co. directors.

On the $1,100,000 bond issue by the Nebraska Power Co. there was a discount of 13½ points, or $148,500, charged by the American Power & Light Co. There was an expense of $650, and a year and a half later the bonds were retired.

Think of it! They were borrowing money when they did not need it, did not want it, and in fact did not know it, and they paid this enormous rate of interest for it, and they kept the money only 18 months. So for the use for 18 months of $951,500 which they apparently did not need, the Nebraska Power Co. paid a discount and expense of $149,150, plus interest of $132,000 on the principal amount of $1,100,000, or a total of $281,150. This was equal, the Trade Commission accountants report, to an interest rate of 19.71 per cent a year.

That is what these great financiers paid. They borrowed money when they did not want it and did not need it and did not know they got it; but they did borrow it, and they had to pay at the end of the transaction an interest rate of 19.71 per cent. That is what these poor Nebraska fellows were paying. That is what these fellows over in Council Bluffs, Iowa, were paying. That is what the washerwoman had to pay in order to feather the nest of this great trust in Wall Street. If anybody wants to look that up, it is Exhibit 5038, page 82. Even the poor farmer can borrow to better advantage than that.

Since the proceeds of the loan were merely applied against the indebtedness of the Omaha company to the holding company, and the average rate previously charged on this indebtedness was only 7 1/8 per cent, the additional interest cost was $119,000 a year, or a total of $179,000. All of this added cost went to the holding company.

Again, in 1924 the Nebraska Power Co. floated securities to the amount of $1,000,000. For these securities it received in net proceeds $902,000; and the great bulk of this, $825,000, was merely left with the Electric Bond & Share Co. to lend out in the call-loan market. Some of it was not drawn upon by the Nebraska Power Co. for five months.

Think of that! This holding company had the Nebraska Power Co. borrow some more money, a million dollars this time, and leave it with them, and they loaned it out on call—gambled with it, in other words. But the poor fellows who had to pay it, and who owed it all, after all, were the little home owners, the laboring men and women of Omaha and surrounding towns.

SALES TO SUBSIDIARY

The Nebraska Power Co. sells electricity to its Council Bluffs subsidiary. The price this Council Bluffs subsidiary pays to the Nebraska Power Co. becomes the basic cost for the fixing of rates in Iowa. On these sales the Nebraska Power Co. takes an estimated profit of 0.04 cent up to 0.63 cent per kilowatt-hour. Chief Counsel Healy intimated that this practice of exacting a profit on sales from the right hand to the left hand might be reached under the Supreme Court decision of February 29, 1932, in the case of the Western Distributing Co. against The Public Utilities Commission of Kansas. This decision appears to have broadened greatly the authority of State utility commissions to regulate charges between affiliated corporations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask permission to introduce a bill and have it properly referred.

Mr. BINGHAM. A parliamentary inquiry. If this permission is granted, will it constitute business which would make in order the calling of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. If there is to be an objection, I will not ask the permission.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the effect of the sales to the subsidiary is to permit the Nebraska Power Co. to collect two profits on this subsidiary's operations. It profits on the direct sales of energy and also on the dividends upon the subsidiary's common stock, which is held by the Nebraska Power Co. The dividends amount to slightly less than $60,000 a year. Ultimately the profits, whichever way they may be made, redound to the benefit of the Electric Bond & Share or American Power & Light interests holding the common stock of the Nebraska Power Co.

RATES

Even after a reduction of domestic rates forced by the Omaha City Council in 1921 and a voluntary reduction of domestic rates in 1929–30, the average Omaha consumer is paying 5.5 cents per kilowatt-hour for his electricity, according to the commission's examiners. The consumer in the small town pays 7.8 cents per kilowatt-hour and the farmer pays an average of 12.8 cents. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19661.)

That rate reductions have been inadequate is evidenced by this testimony of Examiner J. W. Adams:

> Obviously the company's problem is, as stated by its manager, that of getting its rates down as a means of increasing consumption. Such action, however, would have to be carried somewhat further than it has in the past in the direction of rate reductions before it would tend to pass on to consumers any considerable part of large profits that hitherto have been retained for the common-stock equity. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19665.)

Adams's statement takes on more force when it is considered in conjunction with the record of Nebraska Power Co. earnings available for the common stock, which is so much "water," and for surplus. These earnings increased from $829,940 in 1926 to $1,755,303 in 1930. They are estimated to have increased about $160,000 more in 1931, despite the depression. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19637.)

Adams sums up the situation when he says:

> From this showing it appears that in making voluntary reductions in residential rates in Omaha in 1929 the company by no means endangered its ability to pay dividends on the common stock owned largely by its parent company, the American Power & Light Co. The fact is that in every year since the properties were taken over the Nebraska Power Co., after paying all expenses, taxes, interest, and dividends on preferred stock, has realized substantial profits for its common stock, the bulk of which, as shown by the accountant's report, was actually held by the American Power & Light Co. for nine years at no cost to itself. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19629.)

The company actually waged a prolonged fight for higher rates when its earnings fell off just after the war, although the Omaha City Council pointed out that the only result would be to make this "watered" common stock more profitable. (Exhibit 5038, Appendix 10, sheet 9.)

Its application for the rate increase was denied. The company spent $95,000 on rate investigation and valuation, however, and charged it up to operating expenses. (Exhibit 5038, pp. 169–170.)

As I said a while ago, the poor consumer pays it all. It is nothing to the power company how much it pays for a contest over rates; they do not care, they are just collectors, that is all; and they charge a mighty big profit and commission for collecting. The poor consumer bears the entire burden.

WAR AGAINST MUNICIPAL PLANTS

Now see what happens to this municipal competition which is about the only means of regulating the charges and practices of the private companies. Speaking now of Nebraska, and the Nebraska Power Co. and its activities, municipal ownership centers in the two communities of Fremont and Blair. Blair is an oasis of public ownership in Washington County. Nearly all the rest of that county pays tribute to the Nebraska Power Co. Fremont is in somewhat the same position in Dodge County. Blair only distributes its energy, first buying it at wholesale from the Iowa-Nebraska Light & Power Co. Fremont has its own generating plant, serving the city itself and a small rural territory. These towns are 40 or 50 miles from Omaha.

The Iowa-Nebraska Light & Power Co., which sells at wholesale to the city of Blair, serves the territory adjoining that of the Nebraska Power Co. and its Council Bluffs subsidiary. It pretty well surrounds not only the territory of the Nebraska Power Co. but the municipal plants of Fremont and Blair and certain other municipal systems. This Iowa-Nebraska Light & Power Co. is not under Electric Bond & Share, as the Nebraska Power Co. is. It is part of the United Light & Power Co. system, otherwise called the Eaton-Schaddelee group. But its lines interconnect with those of the Nebraska Power Co. and the Nebraska Power Co. subsidiary in Council Bluffs. It buys energy from the Nebraska Power Co., and, more important, it has a "gentleman's agreement" with the Nebraska Power Co. for division of territory. Between the territorial limits of the two companies there is a neutral zone about 2 miles wide into which either company may extend its lines and sell electricity. When a municipal plant can be persuaded to sell out or an opportunity is offered to land a new customer in this neutral zone representatives of the two companies get together and decide which shall have the business.

Against this background of common interest, the Nebraska Power Co. has expanded to the west and northwest in the Platte River Valley in the last few years by purchasing many small private and municipal distributing systems. Several of these systems formerly were served by the Fremont municipal plant, which sold them energy at wholesale.

The result of this expansion by the Nebraska Power Co. is that the Fremont municipal plant is entirely surrounded by Nebraska Power Co. lines. It has lost most of its outside market. But it has continued to operate and, under the law adopted by initiative in 1930, giving municipalities the right to own power lines beyond their municipal boundaries, it is extending its lines into rural territory. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19573.)

In its determination to expand and to put the municipal plants out of business, the Nebraska Power Co. has paid extravagant prices for these municipal plants. To get what idea it could of values, the Trade Commission examiners scrutinized exhibits prepared by the Nebraska Power Co. itself in connection with litigation in Nebraska. They found that, even accepting the company's figures, it had paid for seven plants over 30 per cent more than the estimated cost to reproduce them, without any allowance whatever for depreciation or for obsolete equipment.

There we have it, Mr. President. It took a good while to introduce it, to show what I was going to show, but here we have it. This great representative of the great Power Trust sees, 40 or 50 miles from Omaha, a city owning its own electric-light plant, paid for by its own citizens, giving an illustration, as a matter of fact, of cheap electricity to its citizens. It has expanded and extended its lines. It is serving seven or eight towns in the vicinity, where the people buy current at the Fremont plant and distribute it themselves.

What happens? The Nebraska Power Co. creeps out and surrounds that city with its wires, its network, and it goes to this municipality and to that municipality to buy their distributing system. What do they do? The Federal Trade Commission finds that they paid for those seven plants 30 per cent more than it would cost to build them now, without making any allowance for depreciation or wear and tear. Probably it would be fair to say that they paid 50 per cent more than the plants were worth.

That is poor business. Everybody knows that when that kind of a thing happens somebody must bear the loss. Like others of the extravagances and the bad financing of the Power Trust, it is the poor devil down in the humble home who has to bear the loss.

For the seven plants the company showed a reproduction cost new of $103,783, compared with the purchase price of $134,955. For the Cedar Bluffs group of plants there was shown a reproduction cost new of $24,134 against a purchase price of $35,000. For the Arlington municipal plant there was shown a reproduction cost new of $27,285, compared with the purchase price of $34,000.

The examiners point out that as none of these plants were new and there was no allowance for depreciation, the premiums the power company paid to get them out of the way were actually "considerably greater" than these figures show.

Roy Page, vice president and general manager of the Nebraska Power Co., admitted that the physical value was only a small part of the basis used for determining prices. (Transcript, March 9, p. 19578). A company official testified in the Nebraska litigation that as to certain properties no estimates of value whatever had been made prior to the purchases.

It seems clear that what the company was buying was: First, complete monopoly; second, freedom from regulation which operation of the municipal plants imposes; and, third, opportunity for unhampered profiteering.

Pointing out that the prices for municipal plants have been large and arbitrarily fixed, and that regulation is very limited, with the company admittedly fixing its own rates in the smaller towns, Examiner Adams declared that—

It is reasonable to assume that full prices paid for properties have been considered in any valuation of properties used by the company in determining what its small town rates shall be. (Transcript, March 9, pp. 19581 and 19582.)

INSTANCES CITED ARE ONLY EXAMPLES

Mr. President, this, of course, is only a sample. What the Nebraska Power Co. is doing in Nebraska is being done by the subsidiaries of the Power Trust all over the land. I have been giving concrete instances, but they are only examples. They are no worse than is going on everywhere. I could go over the sunny South in the same way and tell of one case, for example, where the Power Trust went to a municipality that owned its own system and offered to pay a price for it. The price was more than it would have cost to rebuild the plant. The voters voted on the proposal and turned it down. Hardly had the result of the election been announced when the Power Trust came forward with another proposal and a higher offer, and another election was called. The offer was turned down again. Then within a reasonable time after that happened they came forward with a third offer, in which they offered really three or four times more than the plant was worth; and the people voted to sell it. Every time they made a higher offer they got a few more votes, and they kept on until they got their offer so high that the people felt they could not refuse to sell.

What does it mean? It means monopoly. It means they do not want a municipally owned plant that will stand out as a yardstick. They do not want that known or shown any more than they want the discussion to take place in the Senate of the United States in regard to their great propaganda program which they have carried on for the last six or seven years. They will do whatever necessary to accomplish their end. It is the plant they want. They want to prevent such a municipally owned plant from showing to the people what can be done by a municipally owned and properly operated plant. They are afraid of the new yardstick. They have a monopoly and are willing to spend millions to keep it, but the money they spend is not theirs. It is collected in pennies from God's poor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again? I am really sorry to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The very vicious attitude which the Power Trust has shown against Governor Roosevelt is one which some of us can not understand. Does the Senator attribute it to the position he has taken with reference to the ownership of power companies in the State of New York?

Mr. NORRIS. They will take that position against anyone. Let anyone say he is in favor of municipal ownership and he is a marked man so far as the Power Trust is concerned, and it does not make any difference whether he is a candidate for President of the United States or whether he is a candidate for the office of assessor in a country precinct. They are the kind the Power Trust want to defeat. Whenever anyone says or does anything officially or privately that conflicts with their interest and their wishes he is a marked man and he must get on his knees and beg for forgiveness and show by his action that he is willing to be their slave before they will look upon him with favor.

WHEN WILL THE PEOPLE TAKE ACTION?

Mr. President, although I have consumed a good deal of the time of the Senate, nevertheless I have only given the Senate a glimpse at certain spots in the United States, just a glimpse. I could cover the whole country and disclose the same things practically everywhere. Remember, too, as I said in the beginning, that this investigation is only partially finished. God only knows what the future has in store, Mr. President; but if the American people are to be trampled down into the earth by this greatest human monopoly that was ever put together in the history of civilization, I am not willing to say what the result may be. Here in this year of depression, when nearly everyone is suffering, when millions are starving for something to eat, hundreds of thousands of women and children are without suitable clothing to wear, this great trust marches on and on, making its profit on a necessity of human life, and then says to us, and it has the influence to carry out what it says, "You dare not tax us, but you may tax the little fellow."

Some day, Mr. President, the people of the United States, it seems to me, will realize that this great octopus, this greedy monopoly, living on the pennies which are contributed by God's poor, stealing out of the school children's hands the pennies given to them by their parents, going into every home, into every little town, and taking their toll from the toil and sweat of millions of our people in order that they may debauch the very people they rob, presents a picture that ought to cause every man to raise his voice in condemnation of such an unholy, such a wicked, such an indefensible thing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12946) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CHANGE IN THE DATE OF INAUGURATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of Louisiana, together with a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, relative to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Baton Rouge, July 5, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Vice President of the United States,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a duplicate original of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 2, adopted by the Louisiana Legislature at its present session.

Yours very truly,

OSCAR K. ALLEN, Governor.

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 2, relative to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress. (By Mr. Peltier)

1. Whereas at the first session of the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America it was resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that the following article be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, viz:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified, and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission": Therefore be it Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, That the foregoing amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, ratified to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

2. Governor of the State of Louisiana.

TAX ON FUTURE COMMODITY TRANSACTIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram from Thomas Y. Wichkam, chairman of the Grain Committee on National Affairs, Chicago, Ill., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 11, 1932.

Vice President CHARLES CURTIS,
President of the United States Senate:

A grave situation has developed as a result of the utterly prohibitive tax of 5 cents on each $100 value of future commodity transactions. This tax is a 400 per cent increase. The Purnell bill (H. R. 12886), which has the approval of major farm organizations, the Department of Agriculture, bankers, and the Nation's marketing institutions would put this tax back at 2 cents, still a 100 per cent increase. Genuine alarm prevails through agriculture and the agricultural trades that the startling restriction of markets may make it impossible to absorb the new incoming crops. The commodity exchanges of this country, being prevailed upon by the producers everywhere to aid in the situation, wish to advise those in authority that unless the Purnell bill, now in the House Ways and Means Committee, is enacted before Congress adjourns that there is real danger that during the heavy crop-movement period the weight of hedges may prove too great for the markets. As an agricultural emergency relief measure, we can not too strongly urge the necessity of reducing this tax to a level that will not paralyze the movement of commodities and state that an adjournment of Congress without such action can only be construed as utterly disregarding the welfare of agriculture in this pressing emergency.

GRAIN COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS,
THOMAS Y. WICHKAM, Chairman.

Representing: Buffalo Corn Exchange, Chicago Board of Trade, Duluth Board of Trade, Kansas City Board of Trade, Milwaukee Grain & Stock Exchange, Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, New York Produce Exchange, Omaha Grain Exchange, St. Louis Merchants Exchange, Grain and Feed Dealers National Association, Chicago Livestock Exchange, Chicago Mercantile Exchange, and New York Cotton Exchange.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of Edward Melve, of Sellersville, Pa., praying for a congressional investigation to determine who was the first conceiver (the inventor) of the wireless telephone invention, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also laid before the Senate memorials, and papers in the nature of memorials, from sundry citizens and organizations of the States of Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Washington, and Wisconsin, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dies bill, being the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a resolution adopted by the First Mexican Christian Church of San Benito, Tex., representing 50 people, opposing the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram from A. H. Strasser, Tucson, Ariz., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TUCSON, ARIZ., July 13, 1932.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It is the earnest plea of the trainmen in this State that you gentlemen use your influence to prevent Congress from adjourning until the Costigan-LaGuardia bill "to provide emergency financing facilities for unemployment workers, to relieve their distress, to increase their purchasing power and employment, and for other purposes," is passed and signed by the President.

A. H. STRASSER.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAW

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a copy of a report by the New Bedford Bar Association of New Bedford, Mass., relative to the contemplated changes in the present Federal bankruptcy act contained in the new bankruptcy bill now under consideration by committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, and a copy of the resolution adopted by the New Bedford Bar Association.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW BEDFORD BAR ASSOCIATION,
New Bedford, Mass.

GENTLEMEN: We, the committee of the New Bedford Bar Association appointed to study the contemplated changes in the present Federal bankruptcy act contained in the new bankruptcy bill now under consideration by committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, report as follows:

The proposed legislation, unless radically amended, should not have the association's approval, for, in our opinion, it has left unimproved many things that ought to be amended and improved and has incorporated many features which are either impractical or dangerous innovations.

We object specifically to the provisions of the new bill which authorize the Attorney General to appoint a number of administrators, not exceeding 10, at salaries not to exceed $7,500 each, and also a number of examiners who are subject to civil service at salaries not to exceed $4,000 each. We believe this to be an unwise extension of the present tendency of the Government toward multiplication of bureaus and bureaucratic control, with the attendant increase of expense, without holding forth any real hope or promise of improvement in the present system. We approve the provisions of the proposed legislation which require the referees to devote their time exclusively to their duties as such, and which enlarge their jurisdiction. We submit that if the new act should charge the referee with the duty of supervising in greater detail the administration of estates the necessity not only for administrators and examiners, but also for authorized trustees, would be obviated and there would be less division of responsibility.

Your committee is of the opinion that the provisions regarding suspended discharges can not be made to work effectively. We agree that many of the evils existing under the present law arise as a result of the inadequate provisions regarding discharges, but we believe that this situation can be remedied by amendments: (a) Which would place upon the bankrupt the complete burden of proving his right to a discharge rather than upon his creditors to prove that he is not entitled to it; (b) which would shorten the period within which a bankrupt is entitled to apply for his discharge; (c) which would allow the expense of objecting to a discharge to be paid by the estate.

Your committee does not approve in its present form the provision pertaining to assignments for the reason that the act gives to assignments the protection of the bankruptcy court without requiring the estate to be administered under the supervision of the court.

The committee therefore recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, That the New Bedford Bar Association, through its council, adopts the report of its committee appointed to study the proposed bankruptcy act and for the reasons contained in said report records its disapproval of the passage of the bill in its present form; and

"Resolved further, That we request that action on said bill should be delayed until the next session of Congress in order that opportunity may be had for further study of the proposed legislation in the light of the objections raised throughout the country."

FARM RELIEF

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD three addresses delivered July 9 by farm leaders of national standing. The first is by Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; the second by Charles E. Hearst, vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; the third by Earl C. Smith, president of the Illinois Agricultural Association.

I hope every Senator will read these three addresses. In the main I agree with the statements made by these three farm leaders.

This session of Congress has been a busy one; it has faced a most serious situation; it has struggled earnestly to enact emergency relief legislation. But, Mr. President, this Congress has not done its duty. It has refused to deal with fundamentals. It has ignored what seems to me to be a plain fact, that unless and until agriculture is placed in position where the farmer as a whole can receive the cost of production for his products there can be no real relief; there can be no return of employment.

Wages are paid, in the last analysis, by basic commodities. The basic commodity-price level is too low. It is too low not so much because of surpluses as because our monetary system has broken down.

Mr. President, when these farm leaders plead for the passage of the Goldsborough bill to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, they are pleading not only for agriculture but for labor, for industry, for business generally. They are pleading for an honest dollar for the benefit of 90 per cent of the people of this country.

The Federal reserve system should be managed in the interest of the 90 per cent who are producers; not in the interest of the small percentage of the population who are primarily dealers in money.

The plea of these leaders for the enactment of the Norbeck bill, as an emergency measure to force higher prices for wheat, cotton, and hogs, should be heeded by this Congress.

I ask that these addresses be printed for the information of the country and the guidance of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the addresses will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RADIO ADDRESS OF EDWARD A. O'NEAL, PRESIDENT AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1932, WASHINGTON, D. C.

My friends, we are here in Washington, once more, in a final appeal to Congress to come to the rescue of agriculture; once more to demand that Congress not adjourn until it does something fundamental for the relief of agriculture and the Nation.

If this Congress adjourns without doing something effective to save agriculture, then next fall we, too, must cry out, like the prophet of old—

"The summer is ended; the harvest is past; and we are not saved."

But then it will be too late for Congress to repent of its folly that means that farmers would have to go through another year without relief.

How can they do that under present conditions, without unparalleled suffering and distress which may shake to its very foundation our whole economic structure?

Since I talked to you during the Farm Bureau party-line hour, a month ago, a new low record for farm prices has been recorded by the United States Department of Agriculture. Then its latest report showed that the index of farm prices was 56 per cent of the pre-war level; a record low. Since then, the index of farm prices has dropped to 52, the lowest point on record in this country.

It is reported that one of the largest wheat growers in the United States, who is harvesting 500,000 bushels, is receiving but 16 cents per bushel on board the cars, which will leave him but 8 cents after paying freight and commission charges. Cotton has reached the lowest level of prices in its history, and when harvest season comes, what will happen? The producer will not be able to sell some of it at all at any price unless something is done. The prices of wheat and cotton affect the prices of all other basic farm products. With half the Nation unable to pay its debts, its taxes, and its interest, and without money to buy the products of industry, then it must be evident that the welfare of the Nation is at stake in the restoration of farm prices. There are millions of people needing food and clothing, yet this is the condition. Senator BORAH said in the Senate yesterday, there is "no escape from chaos unless the Government stays the fall of commodity prices."

How can farmers exist on such price levels? How can they pay their taxes, maintain their schools and churches, pay the interest on their mortgages and other debts, and save their homes, on such prices? How can they buy the necessities of life for their families? How can our agriculture exist on such prices without being degraded to the level of peasantry?

Yet Congress and the administration, with the power to act to relieve this situation in a far-reaching and effective way, thus far have done nothing fundamental to remedy it. They seem to be concerned mainly with helping the railroads, the banks, the corporations, and the unemployed in the cities, forgetting that there can be no permanent recovery in this country until we start at the bottom and rescue agriculture, the basic industry of this Nation.

The bill to give a moratorium to foreign war debts was passed and signed within 6 days; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act for the relief of the railroads, banks, and other corporations was passed and signed within 13 days; the Glass-Steagall bill for the further relief of the banks was passed and signed in 12 days; but agriculture has waited in vain for more than 7 months—more than 200 days—for some action on the constructive program of agricultural relief which we presented to Congress when it opened early last December.

Let me review for you briefly the record of this Congress and you be the judge of whether it has given agriculture a fair deal. I want to give Congress full credit for the little which it has done for agriculture.

The House passed the Goldsborough bill by a big majority, but the reactionary interests in the Senate thus far have blocked us. The tax bill in the main was fair to agriculture, although containing some unduly burdensome items. Our greatest victory, the defeat of the Federal sales tax, was a fundamental victory, a victory against the leadership in both great parties, a victory that was made possible because agriculture and labor, throughout the Nation, rose up in rebellion against it. Several minor credit measures were passed, which will be of some help to agriculture, but nothing has been done to raise the prices of farm products, so the farmers can pay their debts.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the proposed Garner-Wagner bill amending that act, if finally enacted, allocate to agriculture less than 5 per cent of the stupendous sum of over $4,000,000,000 of public funds appropriated for relief purposes. The big interests have again defeated us in our efforts to control speculation in the marketing of our crops. In our fight for the equalization-fee principle, both Agricultural Committees, after long delay, reported our bill to the Senate and the House, but thus far the House has taken no action, and the Senate recommitted the bill to the committee.

Truly this is a poor record for Congress and the administration. Strange to say, we have been defeated to a large extent by the supposed friends of agriculture—those who ought to have been for us and for our program.

When the 3-way farm bill amending the marketing act was before the Senate, the motion to recommit was made by a Senator from a farm State, and 23 of the 38 votes for recommittal were Senators from predominantly farm States. Had only 5 of these 23 Senators voted against recommittal, our bill would have been saved. We might have had action on it this session. Now it will have to go over until the short session next December, unless Congress is held in session. Most of those who spoke on the floor of the Senate against various phases of our bill were from predominantly farm States—men who ought to have been with us.

In spite of these discouragements, we are fighting on. In the latter days of this session, seeing the danger of no legislation as a result of the long procrastination of Congress, we brought forward an emergency measure, sponsored in the House by Congressman RAINEY, and in the Senate by Senator NORBECK—a measure of an emergency character to tide over our farmers until something more permanent and more fundamental can be passed. It displaces in no way our fight for the equalization-fee principle. We are also making a final desperate effort to obtain action upon the Goldsborough bill for an honest dollar. But few hours are left of this session. Urge your Congressmen and Senators to get in quick action.

Our proposal for allocating Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds for financing the exports of farm surpluses has been included in the conference report on the Garner-Wagner relief bill and will become effective if that is finally enacted into law. This will be most helpful in removing the burden of accumulated surpluses.

I want to say right here that agriculture still has some stalwart friends in Congress—men who are sincere and loyal friends of the farmers, men who have labored earnestly and faithfully here during the past seven months trying to get something fundamental done for agriculture. The blame for Congress's inaction should not be laid upon them. But I am sorry to say there are many others who ought to have been with us and working for our program who have either openly fought our program or who have injured it by their indifference and inaction.

Since I talked to you a month ago, we submitted to the two great national parties our recommendations of fundamental principles for agriculture and the Nation. They gave us courteous hearings and several of our recommendations were adopted in the party platforms. I prefer to reserve an analysis of the platform until they are interpreted by the nominees whose duties are to interpret and carry out the platforms.

But I could not but be appalled and saddened by the fact that at neither of these national conventions, during the sessions which I attended, was there any delegate who stood up on the floor of the convention during the consideration of the platforms to raise his voice in behalf of distressed agriculture and plead her cause although a great many of the delegates had been elected to represent farm States where their farmers were faced with utter ruin.

On the Fourth of July, farmers in more than 10,000 communities throughout the nation, under the leadership of the American Farm Bureau Federation, assembled themselves together in Independence Day picnics in honor of George Washington and rededicated themselves anew to the ideals for which Washington stood.

On that day was sounded a call to the farmers of America to rally together for the preservation of American agriculture as the basic industry of this country. I declared war on the forces of economic greed and selfishness who have dominated this country too long, and who are unwilling that industry and agriculture shall have an honest dollar, who are unwilling that the farmers who produce the basic wealth of this Nation shall have a fair share of the consumer's dollar, a fair share of the national income. I declared war upon the unfaithful legislators and public officials who are willing to vote relief for all other industries but allow agriculture, our basic industry, to sink into ruin. I asked for 10,000,000 volunteers to help me in this struggle for economic freedom and equality for agriculture—a struggle not of violence but of ballots.

The time has come when we must assert ourselves in no uncertain terms. We must elect those who are true friends of agriculture, those who will pledge themselves to carry out our program. I ask your help. I ask you to join with us in this struggle. Let us find out who are our friends and who are not; who are for us and who are against us. Demand of your candidates for public office that they declare themselves on these great principles for which we are standing. Demand that they pledge themselves to support this program for the rehabilitation of agriculture. If they refuse, then give them your answer at the ballot box next November.

We can not win this struggle unless we are united, because our enemies are powerful and numerous. They have vast financial resources and powerful political connections. But if the farmers of America will stand together as one, we will win.

Agriculture must lead the way to the economic recovery of the Nation. It was the deflation of agriculture and the curtailment of her buying power which, more than any other one single factor, wrecked the prosperity of this Nation and brought us to the sad conditions in which we find ourselves to-day.

Why are the factories closed and their employees walking the streets vainly searching for work while their families subsist upon a meager public charity? Why are the great office buildings in New York, Chicago, and our other great cities desolated with deserted offices? Why are the banks failing, factories closing, and business stagnating? Because the buying power of nearly one-half of the population of this country, dependent upon agriculture, has been drying up for more than a decade. You can not cut off the buying power of more than 53,000,000 people without profound disaster to the entire Nation. Many of the greatest business executives of this country with whom I have talked recently now freely concede these facts.

Our great industrial and commercial structure collapsed because its foundation was undermined. We must build anew our economic structure so that such catastrophes as this will not occur. We must build a structure of agriculture, business, and industry founded upon a sound foundation. The chief corner stone of this foundation must be cooperation, equality of opportunity to all—the assurance of a fair share of the national income to each group in our Nation. Too long have we permitted the few to exploit the many. Too long have we allowed those who control the capital wealth of this country to take the major share of the profits, while the farmers who produce the basic wealth of the Nation and the laborers who contribute of their toil take the crumbs that are left.

Such conditions must not be again. After the close of the World War, when the body of the unknown soldier was being laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery amid impressive rites, and the Nation stood with bowed head, silent in grief because of the loss of millions of heroes, the flower of its manhood, the President voiced the sentiment of a war-torn and war-sick world when he fervently declared, "It must not be again." So to-day, as we stand with our heads bowed in sorrow and anguish over the loss of so many homes and fortunes, when we survey the anguish and suffering, the human misery of the world growing out of this depression, we, too, feel constrained to send up a solemn resolve, "It must not be again."

The economic effect of this deflation is much worse than that war. The war cost thirty-five billions, but this cost about $200,000,000,000.

May God hasten the day when our Nation shall be freed from greed and selfishness and when the principles of cooperation and economic justice to all shall prevail. I appeal to you of the city, town, and country, to join with us in the Farm Bureau in this great undertaking.

RADIO ADDRESS OF CHARLES E. HEARST, VICE PRESIDENT AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1932, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Goldsborough bill seeks to provide the Nation with a national monetary policy for the first time in its history. This policy is to provide an honest dollar for agriculture, industry, and trade, a dollar that is stable in value, a dollar that measures the true exchange value of commodities instead of measuring only the supply and demand for gold.

Congress has never fulfilled the obligation imposed upon it by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution directed the Congress to provide a stable currency. Any dollar which fluctuates in value from 64 cents one year to $1.61 in another year is dishonest. Is there any stability of values when such fluctuations are permitted? The fluctuation in the value of the dollar since 1929 measured in commodity prices makes the debtor who borrowed $100 in 1929 pay back $202 to-day. Is there any justice in such a monetary standard?

The Goldsborough bill seeks to remedy this injustice by restoring to normal the purchasing power of the dollar and stabilizing its value at a fair level.

It declares the national monetary policy of the United States is to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the average of the period 1921 to 1929, inclusive, and to maintain its purchasing power at that level. This to be accomplished by controlling the volume of credit and currency. The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are charged with the duty of making effective this policy.

They already have the power to expand and contract the volume of credit and to expand and contract the volume of currency, but heretofore these powers have not been directed toward a basic national policy but have been subject to the individual opinions and wishes of these officials and influenced by the demands of various groups. The result has been that we have had a vacillating policy of inflation and deflation, with disastrous consequences to the whole Nation.

The House passed the Goldsborough bill by the overwhelming vote of 289 to 60. When the bill went over to the Senate the Committee on Banking and Currency sidetracked it by substituting a proposal sponsored by Senator GLASS, of Virginia. The Glass proposal is a mere makeshift, which does not go to the root of the trouble, but was offered, according to the Senator's own published statement, for the purpose of stopping the Goldsborough bill. His proposal allows the national banks to issue currency on the basis of Government bonds owned by them. It is estimated that a maximum of about $1,000,000,000 in additional currency could be issued under the Glass proposal. This might do temporary good, but obviously it does not go to the base of the problem. It prescribes no policy to guide the extent to which this currency shall be issued; each bank can do as it pleases in this regard. It establishes no national monetary policy. It does nothing to prevent the recurrence of these periodic inflations and deflations. It utilizes only one method of expansion of the currency, a method which is rather expensive, costing the people about $40,000,000 to issue it, if the maximum amount is issued. It is obvious that this proposal is a banker's bill and not one which will bring its first benefits to our citizens.

The Glass substitute is now pending before the Senate. The session of Congress apparently is drawing rapidly to a close. Despite our repeated insistence, no action has been taken by the Senate on the Goldsborough bill. Many Senators would like to vote for it, but have not been given an opportunity because of the action of the committee in substituting the Glass proposal.

Obviously if this type of legislation is to be secured there must be prompt action on the part of the Senate. In order to get something done before adjournment our friends in the Senate are trying to get action on the Glass substitute—if necessary, pass it through the Senate, in order to get the two measures in conference between the two Houses, at which time there is hope that a satisfactory compromise can be agreed upon which will receive the approval of both Houses. That is what we are hoping and working for now. We are demanding that something be done now before adjournment and before the whole Nation is ruined by the onward march of the deflation.

This Congress has done but little for agriculture, despite the valiant efforts of some of our stanch friends in Congress. It has passed a lot of so-called relief measures, but few of their benefits have percolated down to the farmers and the masses of the people. Little fundamentally has been done to correct the economic catastrophe which threatens to overwhelm us. "Credit" has been the magic key with which this Congress and this administration has sought to solve all our economic ills. Credit has been the panacea for all evils which beset us. A foreign government has been given a moratorium, the banks, railroads, insurance companies, and other corporations have been doled out credit through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a small portion of which went to agriculture for limited purposes. Again the banks have been extended further credit facilities through the Glass-Steagall bill. The farmers have been extended a few credit measures.

But still the depression goes on; prices sink lower and lower. The forced liquidation of real estate in city and country continues. Unemployment increases. Industry stagnates, banks fail, agriculture remains prostrate.

The mere extension of credit does not go to the root of our troubles but merely postpones for a time the evil day. Soon it is necessary to come back again and ask for more credit to postpone it still longer, and thus the process continues until final ruin overtakes many, while the strongest are able to survive only with heavy losses.

Something more fundamental must be done than to extend credit. We must strike at the root of the evil—the deflation of our prices to their present ruinous levels. Something must be done to restore the commodity-price level, so debts can be repaid, so the farmers' purchasing power will be restored, so our factories can reopen and put to work our unemployed. There will be no trouble about balancing the Government Budget when we do something fundamental to balance the citizens' budgets. A restoration of the price level, and not credit, is necessary in order to bring this about.

The Goldsborough bill would give immediate and effective relief not only to agriculture but to industry and to labor by restoring the commodity price to a normal level.

RADIO ADDRESS OF EARL C. SMITH, PRESIDENT ILLINOIS AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1932, WASHINGTON, D. C.

While pleased to avail myself of this opportunity to speak over the National Broadcasting chain, yet, in these crucial hours and days we are passing through, I feel as never before the responsibility one carries who attempts to discuss vital issues of the day. Not only the future welfare of agriculture but the principles of our Government are hanging in the balance. It is, therefore, imperative that the great majority of our citizens who are yet wanting to be fair come to a full understanding as to the cause of the present situation and the forces that are operating to retard recovery" from the present depression.

After 12 years of continued deflation in agriculture, we are witnessing what has long been predicted—the complete collapse of our business and financial structure. Any industry which comprises in large part the sources of new wealth can not long be ignored or neglected without a situation presenting itself such as we have to-day.

Throughout these years agriculture, while only partly organized, has honestly and aggressively presented its problems and remedies at council tables with leaders of the State and Nation. With very few exceptions, the answers to these appeals have been the answers of those in control of the finances of the Nation. Farmers have not been given what they asked for but rather have been given palliatives which were doomed to failure at the outset. These programs have not only failed to revive agriculture but have operated to cause many well-thinking people to believe that legislation is not essential to bring about the stabilization of agriculture and prosperity of farm people.

The present Congress has given practically its entire attention to legislation having for its purpose assistance and relief to the large financial and industrial interests of the Nation.

The basic industry of all, agriculture, has been either neglected or ignored. Recognizing this situation and the fast approaching close of Congress, the American Farm Bureau Federation prepared a very simple, practical emergency measure having for its purpose the immediate price improvement of agriculture's three largest crops—hogs, wheat, and cotton. This measure was introduced in the House by Representative HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, majority leader of the House, and in the Senate by Senator NORBECK, of South Dakota, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. We have appeared before the agricultural committees of both House and Senate in executive session to explain this measure and its purposes. Following these meetings the committees reported the measure to the House and Senate, where they now rest on the calendars. We are insisting that Congress not adjourn until it has taken action on this emergency legislation.

Briefly the measure proposes through the issuance of negotiable certificates to give to the farmer the full benefit of the tariff on that portion of his production needed for domestic consumption. This in addition to the present price he is receiving.

It would increase his present returns by 42 cents a bushel on wheat, 2 cents a pound on hogs, and 5 cents a pound on cotton.

It would not cost the Government Treasury one penny, as all revenue necessary to absorb the increased returns to farmers is realized through a tax imposed at the point of processing these commodities.

In practical operation the present channels or system of distribution could and would easily absorb this tax, which is imposed in an amount equal to commodity tariff rates.

On these three commodities alone, nearly 3,000,000 farmers would have an increased cash income of approximately one-half billion dollars within the next year.

Economists tell us that such price improvement on these three basic crops would cause or influence an increase in price levels of other agricultural commodities equal to another $500,000,000.

This legislation has been discussed with many leaders and Members of Congress, several administrators of Government, and many business leaders of national reputation. With hardly an exception they admit this legislation will accomplish what is claimed for it by its authors and sponsors. Practically every thinking person now recognizes that the price improvement of agricultural crops and consequent increased return to farmers is an essential to assist in getting America started out of the present depression.

Raise the price levels of basic farm products, thereby adding $1,000,000,000 to the buying power of agriculture in the next year, and you will again start the wheels of industry, restore jobs to hundreds of thousands of unemployed in the cities, and inspire the whole country with a new confidence and hope for the future.

With such admitted facts it would seem inconceivable, nevertheless it is true that Congress is fast approaching adjournment and yet addresses its attention to relief legislation which is almost totally confined to further relief for large industrial, commercial, and banking institutions.

If agriculture is to receive proper attention in this emergency, farmers of the Nation must rise up and immediately demand that their representatives in Congress actively participate in the movement to block adjournment of Congress until this or other equally effective emergency legislation is enacted into law.

Surely Congress will assume a grave responsibility if it adjourns without action upon proper and effective measures necessary to assist farmers in getting to their feet, and allows the ruinous condition now confronting farmers to longer continue in their destructive effects, not only upon agriculture but upon the Nation.

Mr. VANDENBERG (for Mr. WATERMAN), from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on to-day, July 14, 1932, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 3276) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the production of sulphur upon the public domain within the State of Louisiana," approved April 17, 1926.

Mr. BLAINE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). On account of my general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent, and being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND];

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY];

PAY OF PAGES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 475) making an appropriation for the payment of pages for the Senate and House of Representatives from July 16 to July 25, 1932, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary to provide for the payment of 21 pages for the Senate and 41 pages for the House of Representatives at the rate provided by law from July 16 to July 25, 1932, both dates inclusive.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the joint resolution merely extends the time for payment of the pages from July 16 to July 25. It looks as though we are not going to adjourn immediately, and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Will this request, if agreed to, displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. KING. If it would, I should object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENTRY UNDER BOND OF CERTAIN EXHIBITS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4747), to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries, and products of the soil, mine, and sea, which were on page 2, line 20, to strike out all after "date" down to and including "use" in line 24; and on page 3, line 8, after "Treasury," to insert: ": And provided further, That all such articles shall, at the expiration of two years, be subject to the impost duty then in force, unless the same shall have been sold or exported from this country prior to that period of time."

Mr. WAGNER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House further insisted upon its amendment to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, and further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill.

EMERGENCY UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting upon its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, and further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment numbered 1, that it further insist upon its amendments numbered 1 and 2, and that it ask a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what particular amendments are the ones upon which we are asked to insist?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The disagreement reported was an entire disagreement.

Mr. GLASS. There is but one amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought I understood the motion to apply to two amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The House made only one amendment to the Senate bill. The conference reported a complete disagreement.

Mr. CONNALLY. The reason for my inquiry is that I had understood the House was insisting on the publicity amendment and that the Senate conferees were resisting it. I do not want to be placed in the position of now voting to insist on disagreeing to the publicity amendment if that is what is holding up agreement on the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Actually it is my information that an agreement was in sight upon every subject except the publicity amendment, but the report as made to the House was a complete disagreement.

Mr. CONNALLY. The effect of it is that what the Senate conferees are standing out against is the publicity amendment which was adopted by the House. I, as one Senator, do not want to be placed in the position of blocking all relief legislation because the Senate is unwilling to agree to the publicity amendment placed on the bill by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it would be in order, if the Senator wishes to do so, to move to instruct the Senate conferees to yield with respect to that subject.

Mr. CONNALLY. I intend to make a parliamentary inquiry about that matter before I shall give up the floor, to ascertain whether that would be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I believe I have the floor, but I have done about all I can do with the matter for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I think the Senate will place itself in a very untenable position if the Senate takes the position that it is going to defeat relief legislation unless the House of Representatives recedes from the amendment providing for publicity with relation to loans to be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The money which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to loan does not belong to that corporation. It does not belong to Mr. Hoover. It does not belong to Senators. It belongs to the people of the United States. For one, I believe that under proper safeguards, not during the pendency of the loans perhaps, but after the loans are made, the Senate and the country ought to have information as to what the loans are and who are getting the loans. It is public money. The people of the country, according to the information I can get from the country, are just about gorged already with the dishing out of billions of dollars by the Treasury to certain particular favored interests.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator if the banks which borrow the money do not have to make reports any way to the Comptroller of the Currency and does not every borrowing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have to become public anyway?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know about the exact character of the reports required to be made to the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the Senator understands that I have no objection to the fullest possible publicity. I want to point out that there would be in the bill a provision requiring full publicity as to all loans made under the act, and that we have already passed a resolution creating a special committee of five to investigate all loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and that while the investigation could be executive, the committee would have full power to publish any information they obtain. There is also pending a separate resolution of the Senate, being the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which has been presented and discussed to some extent, which would enable the Congress to provide the publicity that is provided for in the House amendment. What I am seeking to avoid is just such condition as arose here a week or two ago, when, on account of a difference, the bill was vetoed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator agree with the policy of having the President tell us in advance just what we may pass?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly not!

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not that in effect the course we are to follow if we meet the wishes of the White House?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Having been advised that the bill would be vetoed if a certain provision was retained——

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the President convey that information by message?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no. I am referring now to the veto that has already occurred in connection with the bill. Having been advised that the veto would be made, I think it would have been the part of wisdom to have modified the bill so as to pass it then. I have no information that the President would veto the bill if the publicity provision were retained in the House amendment.

I have no information that the President would veto this bill if the publicity provision were retained as incorporated in the bill by the House. What I am seeking to say is that we ought not to get into a deadlock and that if it be true that such a provision would prompt a veto, it would be a mistake to insist upon the retention of that provision in this bill, particularly in view of the publicity provisions that are already in the bill and of the resolution which has already been passed and the fact that we can determine the question of the publicity separately if we desire to do so. In other words, I want to pass this bill. I am weary of controversies that ought to be eliminated or that can be eliminated.

I am perfectly willing that the conferees should take this matter back and reach an agreement. I think they ought to reach an agreement, and I think they will reach an agreement. If the Senator wishes to move to instruct the conferees to yield on the publicity point, we can test out here the sense of the Senate, and I myself will not resist it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may intervene——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection, as one of the conferees, to being instructed.

Mr. CONNALLY. The House has just voted on this proposition again, and reinforced its attitude, and stated that it would not recede from the publicity amendment; and yet Senators here are asking to have another conference, when it is admitted that the only real point of difference is the publicity provision.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I do not approve of the position of Senators finding out in advance just what the White House wants and then insisting on not passing anything except what has been handed down to us with the approval of the White House. It is the duty of the Senate and the duty of the House to enact legislation which meets with our views of soundness and of propriety. If the President wants to veto it, that is his constitutional function. The way to convey information to the branches of the Congress by the White House is through a presidential message. This backstairs arrangement by which the President, through his emissaries, is seeking constantly to instruct the Congress and to threaten the Congress with what he will do unless the Congress passes exactly what he dictates is not at all in harmony with American traditions and American institutions.

Mr. BYRNES and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether he intends to offer a motion to instruct the conferees?

Mr. CONNALLY. I may or I may not. I will get to that a little farther on.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest to the Senator that, unless he wants to sacrifice all provisions of the bill put in by the Senate which were not contained in the House bill, we will have to have another conference.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not objecting to another conference, but when the conferees go back I am interested in what they are going to do.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Senator is now proposing without any qualification to sacrifice every provision that the Senate put in the bill and to agree to the House bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. The Senator from Texas is not proposing to sacrifice anything; but the Senator from Texas wants to remove the obstacle to an agreement if the only obstacle is publicity.

Mr. GLASS. Why does the Senator not move to instruct the conferees?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to move to instruct them now because the Senate perhaps at this moment is not in the temper to instruct them. The Senator from Virginia would vote against instructing them.

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection——

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator vote to instruct them? Oh, no; the Senator would not.

Mr. GLASS. I say I have no objection to being instructed.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the Senator would vote against instructing the conferees; so would the Senator from Arkansas, and so will other Senators.

I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas first proposed a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONNALLY. While the conferees are out, before bringing any report back to the Senate, is it in order at any stage of the proceedings to move to instruct the conferees as to points in disagreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not after the conferees have been appointed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not after they have been appointed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The time to make such a motion is after the pending motion shall have been agreed to, to send the bill to conference, and before the appointment of the conferees.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is just one little flitting moment when it can be done. When they once get the bill and go off in a room there is no power that the Senate has to control them unless they come back and ask for instructions. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. I have been called out, and have just returned at the moment when this very agreeable altercation between Hercules and Achilles is being conducted in the highly Grecian style which was emulated with joy by the Romans; but I do not understand, in this very agreeable verbalistic combat, what is the question before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to insist upon the Senate amendments to the House bill and ask for a conference.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas, with the permission of the Senator from Texas, if the House provision makes the publicity provision retroactive, or is it just in the future?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it is retroactive.

Mr. WAGNER. It is in the future.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am informed by the Senator from New York that it is effective for future loans.

Mr. COUZENS. Only for future loans?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I merely wish to express confidence that the conferees will reach an agreement in a very short time. I do not want to deter the Senator if he wants the conferees instructed. Of course, I have no objection to that; but I am expressing my own individual opinion when I say I am very confident of an agreement being reached in a short time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the Senator from New York?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New York, does he believe that the publicity provision will be stricken out by the conferees? I am very much in favor of the publicity provision of the House bill.

Mr. WAGNER. Again expressing an individual opinion only, I do not think it will be. That is my individual opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I certainly hope it will not be.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not want to take up much more of the Senate's time, but while I am on this subject I want to make a few more remarks.

Suppose the President of the United States does veto the relief bill because of the clause providing for publicity respecting Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans, whose responsibility will it then be if this bill shall fail? The responsibility will not rest upon the Congress; it will not rest upon the House of Representatives or the Senate; it will rest squarely on the doorstep of the White House. The President, up to date, has had his way in dictating to the Congress the exact form, the exact outlines, the exact substance of the relief bill in its general provisions. If the President wants to take the responsibility of vetoing this bill, let him veto it, and let the country know where the responsibility rests.

What will his objection be? He will veto it on the ground that it will be wrong to let the people know where their money is going, being loaned by a board under the control of the President, by a board that can be removed by the President in a moment, by a board that is now dominated by the President, and by a board into whose affairs the President already on more than one occasion has intervened with reference to loans pending before them. Why should the President be afraid of the publicity of what that board may do? Why should the board be afraid? If the loans they make are based upon adequate security, if they are to concerns engaged in business or industry, giving employment to the unemployed, why should anybody fear publicity? Why is it unsound?

I want here and now to state that, in my opinion, this whole proceeding by which we have introduced into our system a new plan of Executive legislation, Executive dictation in advance of what legislation shall be, is un-American. I am surprised that some Senators, who on ordinary occasions are so courageous and so bold, should offer on the floor of the Senate an argument that unless we draw this bill exactly in a precise form it will possibly meet a presidential veto. Let the President perform his functions; let the Congress perform theirs; and when he sends his messenger here to tell the Senate and the other House of Congress in advance what they must do, let the Congress send back its messenger with a statement that if the President will perform the Executive functions the Congress, as representatives of the people and pursuant to constitutional provisions, will perform legislative functions.

Mr. President, I desire the Chair to advise me just when I may make the motion, in order that I may not overlook the opportunity of making the motion, to instruct the conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done as soon as the motion which has been made by the Senator from Arkansas has been agreed to and before the Chair has appointed the conferees. The present occupant of the chair will protect every right the Senator from Texas has.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am going to undertake to advise the Senator from Texas, though I do not expect him to accept the advice, and to indulge in a little frank talk to the Senate about publicity of Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans.

The Senator from Texas is a new convert, so far as his voice in the Senate is concerned, about the publicity for these loans. We have before the Senate right now a resolution which does not have to be attached to this bill, which does not have to be hooked up to this bill at all, thereby risking a veto of the bill on account of it. The Senator from Nebraska has a resolution now pending before the Senate providing for publicity of all loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. President, if this provision in this bill is going to mean a veto, I am not in favor of the provision remaining in the bill, because the last House bill that the Speaker of the House insisted upon did not have in it the provision for publicity of loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bill that was vetoed by the President had in it certain private loans; and the bill was vetoed, as we understood, because the President would not sign the bill with the private loans in it. Therefore the Democrats of the Senate concluded to remain in session and to let the President take the responsibility for having stricken out the provision for private loans, and to prefer to pass a bill giving nine-tenths of the desired relief rather than a bill giving the people no relief at all.

So we went ahead on that course. Now the measure has gone over to the House, and the House has stricken out its bill and put another matter in the bill that was not heard of in the other bill that went to the President, that we are told from some sources means another veto of the bill.

This talk about standing pat and not letting the President dictate this legislation is something that I agreed with a long time ago, but it is too late to talk about that now. That is not the view that this side of the Chamber has taken. This side of the Chamber has taken the position that it was going to extricate all the benefits it could out of the bill that was vetoed by the President of the United States. It never was in the minds of men on this side of the Chamber that they were going to go out and have the House write into that bill some new matter equally objectionable and equally certain to cause a veto of this relief legislation.

If we had any idea of having another showdown with the President on something else, there was no sense in holding the Senate and the Congress in session to send something else back to the President of the United States. I think the position that is taken by the House of Representatives in this matter is extremely unwise.

I am for all the harmony in the Democratic Party that we can have. I am no particular partisan of the views of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I think I have established that pretty well in this body. I am not particularly undertaking to promote the ideas of anyone, but we have certain things in this bill. When we were debating as to what we ought to do, whether we ought to stand pat on the veto by the President of the bill that was sent to him the last time and adjourn, or come back and cut out what we knew he would not sign and what we knew we could not pass over his veto, I went on the other side of the Chamber and consulted such men as the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and others, because there was not any particular unanimity of feeling among the Democrats as to what would be the best thing; and it was the view of the men on the Democratic side and the progressives on the Republican side that we had to pass some relief bill getting whatever relief we possibly could get from this Congress, and that bill had to have the signature of the President.

It could not be passed without it. It is foolish to talk now about another impasse, to throw out this bill and have another test of strength and another deadlock because something has been written into this bill that was not in the last bill at all, and allow the House to come here and put something else in this one and then go back and have this one vetoed, and then cut that out and have the House put some other political plank in the bill and get it vetoed. We might as well have adjourned this session of Congress when we passed the last bill as to come back here now and have another test of political strength.

I think it is bad strategy from a political standpoint on the part of the President of the United States. I think he is making a mistake in not having publicity of these loans of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I was in favor of that. A week ago I stood on the floor of the Senate for about 45 minutes and made a speech in favor of the Norris resolution. None of these enthusiastic Senators made any remarks at that time undertaking to pass the Norris resolution. That resolution was on the calendar then and is on the calendar right now. If we are anxious to have this session of Congress pass upon whether or not the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to publish its reports, we can hold Congress in session long enough to pass on the Norris resolution, and not have the meritorious features of this relief bill vetoed because the Norris resolution can not be hooked into it. That is what we can do.

It is not sense, it is not doing right by the people of this country, for the bullheadedness of any one man—I do not care who he is—of any party to deadlock Congress and beat this relief bill again. We know the position of the President of the United States.

My State has some benefits in this bill. We need the help of this bill. The 48 States of America need it. It may be thought that I am selfish about it, but I am no more so than any of the other people from the 48 States. We know that there is certain legislation that the President will not sign; and I am not willing, any more than I was willing in the case of the League of Nations or anything else, for one little point which may be of benefit to keep us from deriving nine-tenths of the benefit of any bill.

So I say, Mr. President, that it should be our move here on both sides of this Chamber to convince the House conferees that we do not want another political proposition, however sound it may be, attached to this bill if it means another veto. We ought not to do it. I am not willing to have it done.

I do not believe the men on this side of the Chamber ought to want it done, and I do not believe they ought to have it done. I think we ought to stand on this report, send it back, and use a little bit more common sense in telling somebody else they may have to give in a little bit.

I am tired of giving in, and pulling chestnuts out of the fire for some people that get themselves in an embarassing position on this bill. I am tired of it. We need this help in this country. It is not all we need. We need to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation investigated; but when we know we can not get that, is that any reason why we have to put our heads in a halter and hang the balance of this bill and have it defeated for the American people at this time?

I submit, Mr. President, that we ought to sustain the position that we stand by all that we have said there, and when the bill goes back to conference, then, the conferees can find out what will happen, as they found out last time. We knew last time that the other bill was going to be vetoed if we left the private loans in it. We were told that, and we knew it; and we can know now, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation publicity remains in the bill, whether there is going to be a veto or not. If it does mean a veto, I think our conferees should stand to get the benefits of this bill. However, if they find that if the bill is passed by the two Houses it will not meet an Executive veto, then I would say keep the publicity there.

I am so new in this body, and I am so unfamiliar with its rules, that I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] this question:

If a resolution is passed by the two Houses to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation report its loans to Congress, does that require the signature of the President?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. LONG. That is required?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Then if Senators want to make a political issue with the President, they can stay here and have him veto that resolution just the same. If they want to show his position, there is a fair, uninterrupted, unobstructed method by which his stand can be made known to the American people. But there is no rhyme or reason or excuse in defeating a relief bill that has been worked for by the men on this side of the Chamber. This is a Democratic relief bill, framed by the Democrats of this Congress in the Senate, and it is not fair to this body to have it hazarded and to have these relief benefits stricken out or vetoed and another blockade created here.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just long enough to present the report of the conference committee?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. I want to say just a word.

Mr. WAGNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. COLLIER,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am very much moved by what must be the appearance to those who reflect upon the object of this body in hearing these discussions as to the President's veto.

The ordinary traveler, touched here and there with the classics of life, should he find himself in the great capitol at Rome, and near to the great forum which held the famous body of the Roman Senate, would be reminded that upon a statue there is the famous query which, we are told, Christ addressed to Saint Peter. When Peter was seen in the shadows, rushing over to an opposite road, we are informed that the voice exclaimed:

Quo vadis?

We ask here, in the words of the sacred suggestion, which way are we going? To which way are we moving? When has it become the sense of propriety, or that which could be called the statesmanship of this body, that we should rise here from time to time to anticipate what the President of the United States may or may not do and then flash with a judgment against the President on some assumed theory that he will veto this measure or that unless we yield or detract in something? I ask, where is the theory of our organization that justifies this great body, in the exercise of its intelligence and propriety, in assuming that under every conceivable circumstance the President is going to do something which the Senate feels will be wrong, and, therefore, on the assumption denounce the act before it is committed, continue denouncing the author and perpetrator of an imaginary act before he has committed it? And, sirs, let me demand, where is the right to assume on the part of this body that has a duty to create conflict between Members on either side as, between themselves or as against its political opponents, upon the theory that, if something is contained in a bill or something is omitted from a measure, therefore, the President of the United States, in an arbitrary spirit, will take such actions as will make the one appropriate to his favor or the other obnoxious to the rights of the Senate?

Where, sir, is the source that has communicated to us what the President intends to do? Who conveys the secret mind of the President to our chamber of horrors? Who carries the inner reflection of the President to whisper it to us? Who has been ordered here to be the oracle of the Delphic temple from which issue the whispers as to what the President will do and what he will not do in each given course? And, may we not ask, what manner of action are we, the eminent Senators of the United States, in this great body, to justify ourselves in firing ourselves into a hysterical dilemma, together with a hysterical eruption, upon some sizzling theory of what each Senator assumes the President of the United States may or may not do with a measure after we have passed it to him?

Is it not decorous that we proceed to do that which we feel is our duty under the conditions which surround us, and then let that duty pass in the ordinary course as provided by the Constitution up to the Executive power, if it is that to which it is to go? Then and there trust in the theory that the Executive, in the execution of the Constitution, in the discharge of a conscientious duty, and in the performance of what he owes to his country under the same circumstances that impel us, will execute in his own behalf and the just need of the Nation the discharge of his duty guided by the commands of law and the voice of conscience. Then, when such is done, we will have some vision of what has transpired; we will be justified in some comment or commendation.

Under the present circumstances, to give evidence to the country all around us that we summon up the ghost of peril and antagonism and turn against it and with horror shudder at the contemplation of a thing we assume the President will commit, and thus leave direct everything to a confusion worse than chaos, is not characteristic of the body of the Senate nor justified by the situation on the presented facts.

I, sir, take the liberty to suggest that the course shall be that which should be the course of the United States Senate. The Senate to perform its own obligation as it feels it, discharge its duty as it contemplates it, and do that which it thinks is best under the conditions under which it or he or they shall speak, then send the measure forward to the Executive under the assumption in his behalf that we trust him, will believe in him, and let him know that we support him in the faithful discharge of his duty, and do not accuse at the beginning that his conduct will be wrong and in violation of the rights of the American public. Let us continue the fraternity of official trust and mutual confidence.

The report was agreed to.

EMERGENCY EMPLOYMENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1, that it further insist upon its amendments Nos. 1 and 2, that it ask a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is on the point of naming the conferees.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not want to do anything that will hinder in any wise the conferees in their action toward getting an agreement, and if the conferees will give assurance that before they strike out this publicity amendment they will come back to the Senate to report first, I shall not press my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no parliamentary method by which that assurance may be procured.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not insist on the motion at this time, in view of certain assurances from Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the motion, the Chair appoints the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 4522. An act to authorize the conveyance to the State of Tennessee of certain land deeded to the United States for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park and not needed therefor; and

S. 4661. An act to repeal an act entitled "An act to legalize the incorporation of national trade-unions," approved June 29, 1886.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10372. An act to authorize the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks to employ landscape architects, architects, engineers, artists, or other expert consultants;

H. J. Res. 473. Joint resolution to amend the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia," approved July 8, 1932; and

H. J. Res. 474. Joint resolution making available as of July 1, 1932, the appropriations contained in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1933 for the Departments of Agriculture, Post Office, Treasury, and War, and ratifying obligations incurred in anticipation thereof.

TRANSPORTATION OF VETERANS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 473, which has just come over from the House.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 473) to amend the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia," approved July 8, 1932, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia," approved July 8, 1932, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That to enable the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, upon the request of any honorably discharged veteran of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia who is desirous of returning to his home, to provide such veteran with transportation thereto prior to July 25, 1932, by railroad or such other means of transportation as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may approve, including allowance in advance for gas and oil for travel in privately owned automobile, together with travel subsistence at the rate of 75 cents per day, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, and in the event such amount is insufficient there is hereby appropriated out of the general post fund authorized by the act of July 1, 1902, and the act of June 25, 1910 (U. S. C., title 24, secs. 136 and 139), such amount as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may determine to be necessary: Provided, That where transportation is authorized by other than railroad the amount allowed for same shall not exceed the cost of railroad transportation: Provided further, That all amounts expended under this appropriation in behalf of any veteran shall constitute a loan without interest which, if not repaid to the United States, shall be deducted from any amount payable to such veteran on his adjusted-service certificate."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the availability of the money for the transportation home of the ex-service men now in Washington will expire at midnight to-night. This joint resolution is simply one extending the time until the 25th of July, if any additional money is needed to carry out the original purpose of the appropriation. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the consideration of this joint resolution will not impair the status of the merger bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is being protected amply in his rights by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. KING. I wanted to be sure the Chair would protect him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passsed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE AGRICULTURAL, TREASURY, POST OFFICE, AND WAR DEPARTMENTS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 474, which has just reached the Senate from the House.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 474) making available as of July 1, 1932, the appropriations contained in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1933 for the Departments of Agriculture, Post Office, Treasury, and War, and ratifying obligations incurred in anticipation thereof, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriations and authority with respect to appropriations contained, respectively, in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, for the Department of Agriculture, the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, shall be available from and including July 1, 1932, for the purposes respectively provided in such appropriations and authority for the service of such fiscal year. All obligations incurred during the period between June 30, 1932, and the respective dates of enactment of each of such acts in anticipation of such appropriations and/or authority are hereby ratified and confirmed if in accordance with the terms thereof.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I may say that this is simply a joint resolution reaffirming the validity of appropriations that were made after the 1st of July for activities of the Government beginning the 1st of July. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will not the Senator explain the significance of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, as to appropriation bills we passed, say, the 5th or 6th of July, or any time after the 1st of July, there is some uncertainty as to whether the appropriations made will relate back to the 1st day of July, and this joint resolution would remove all doubt about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACT FOR THE PURCHASE OF TWINE

Mr. REED. Mr. President, yesterday, in discussing a certain contract let by the Post Office Department for twine, I believe that I did an injustice to the officials of the Post Office Department who had charge of the contract. I have read the letter to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which appears on page 15207 of the RECORD, and as the facts are stated in that letter, I want to say now that I think the action of those officials was correct, and was necessitated by the language of the law which we have passed.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania says he has changed his opinion by reason of the letter written to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations by the Postmaster General. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania in reading the letter from the Postmaster General noticed this statement, which appears on page 15207 of the RECORD:

> When the bill was under discussion by the Senate, the committee amendment was objected to by Senator REED.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania will look at the RECORD of June 28 he will find that he, the Senator from Pennsylvania, did not object to the amendment. On the contrary, he stated that he did not object to it, that he was not inclined to make any objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. REED. Yes; but that is not the amendment to which the letter refers. The amendment referred to in the letter is the amendment changing the word "or" to "and."

Mr. BYRNES. I will say this, that if the Senator from Pennsylvania will look at the RECORD he will find that he made no objection to any amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. REED. No; I did not.

Mr. BYRNES. That being true, I want to call his attention to the fact that the Postmaster General advised the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the Senator from Pennsylvania objected to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. He was talking about the committee amendment, to which I did object.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Pennsylvania will not find in the RECORD that he objected to the committee amendment. If he will examine the RECORD, which I have looked at in the last two hours, he will find that that is a fact.

Furthermore, may I call attention to the fact that it is stated in the letter from the Postmaster General:

> Following a protracted discussion, the committee amendment was rejected.

That statement has absolutely no foundation in fact. There was no protracted discussion. There was no statement by any Senator except the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who explained the amendment, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, who said that, having heard the amendment read at the desk, he was under the impression that it was only discretionary; however, that he had no objection to it.

That was the "protracted discussion," because when the Senator from Pennsylvania made that statement, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], the chairman of the committee, said he had no objection to the amendment. The amendment was agreed to, and the Postmaster General calls that a "protracted discussion."

From those two statements contained in the RECORD, the accuracy of the statements of the Postmaster General can well be judged. The Senator from Georgia, who offered the amendment, urged it with no purpose in mind other than to carry out the intent of the Congress that American produced and manufactured goods would be given preference; and the Postmaster General has deliberately sought to read into the language of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia an intent and a meaning not justified by the language, and certainly not justified by the intent of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not now wish to discuss the letter of the Postmaster General further than to say that his interpretation of the amendment is childish. I said very plainly on this floor when the question was under discussion the Postmaster General was not free to deal with the particular problem presented to him by this amendment, because of the tremendous power of one of the most highly protected interests in this country; that is, the jute interest, the Ludlow interests, an interest that has written its tariff directly in opposition to every accepted principle of protection, for its own private benefit, and it has had always the servile acquiescence of that party which now controls the Post Office Department.

FUNDS OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I present a communication from employees of the Government Printing Office and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> North Capitol Savings Bank, 1 H Street NW., was closed by the Comptroller of the Currency, John W. Pole, to-day and has caused a serious condition for the employees of the Government Printing Office.
> Twenty-nine out of thirty-two sick-relief and pension associations of the Government Printing Office had all of their funds in this bank.
> Practically all of the employees had their savings in this bank, which are lost. The Government Printing Office employees' associations have at the present time on the sick list and in hospitals over 60 employees who are being cared for through the relief funds which have been lost in this bank. Each employee contributes from $1 to $5 per month voluntarily. This relief fund is necessary on account of the fact that there is no sick leave at the Government Printing Office.
> Practically every employee of the Government Printing Office, with any savings at all, had them in this bank. The condition is really serious.
> The employees of the Government Printing Office beg the Senate to give them the money they have earned.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I felt it necessary to have that statement read in order to inform the Senate of the condition of the finances of the employees of the Government Printing Office, with the hope that action upon the resolution which I offered this morning may be facilitated if it is possible for the Appropriations Committee to do so.

I have talked to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and he tells me it is going to be very difficult at this late hour to secure any action upon the resolution referred to; but, for the information of the Senate and for the information of members of the Appropriations Committee, I have had the statement read in order that they may be informed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEVELOPMENT OF INLAND WATERWAYS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, we are in the closing days or hours of this session of Congress, and, in view of that fact, I feel it my duty to make known to the Congress, on behalf of the great many people in the great Mississippi Valley, their keen disappointment at the failure of Congress to carry out the great program for development of inland waterways that has for years been sponsored by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, the failure of the Congress to provide a comprehensive plan for financing and finishing the inland waterways at this session of Congress leaves the old method of making piecemeal appropriations and letting contracts by piecemeal that has been pursued for the last 30 or 40 years—a system of wasteful, pork-barrel appropriation and contracting that has resulted in spending $470,000,000 upon the so-called Mississippi River system, including the Ohio, Tennessee, Mississippi, Illinois, and Missouri Rivers.

The relief bill that was passed by the Congress provides for the continuation of that system of letting contracts and that system of making appropriations. Under that procedure the chances are that it will take another 20 or 30 years to complete these inland waterways.

When I say that the people of the Mississippi Valley are greatly disappointed that the present Congress has not carried out the program of the President as enunciated for years by President Hoover, I have in mind the program that he has enunciated and for which he has spoken—that is, a plan of financing the construction of these inland waterways that could complete them in five years.

But I need not in my words state what the President said. I will quote his own words in order that the Congress may know the President's former attitude on the development of these inland waterways.

In his speech of acceptance of August 11, 1928, he said:

Nature has endowed us with a great system of inland waterways. Their modernization will comprise the most substantial contribution to Mid West farm relief and to the development of 20 of our interior States.

This modernization—

includes not only the great Mississippi system, with its joining of the Great Lakes and the heart of the Mid West agriculture to the Gulf, but also a shipway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic.

These improvements—

He said—

would mean so large an increment in farmers' prices as to warrant their construction many times over.

He said at that time and in that address:

There is no more vital method of farm relief.

At Louisville, Ky., on the 23d day of October, 1929, in an address, he stated:

The Mississippi system comprises over 9,000 miles of navigable streams. I find that about 2,200 miles have now been modernized to 9 feet in depth, and about 1,400 miles have been modernized to at least 6 feet in depth. Therefore some 5,000 miles are yet to be connected or completed so as to be of purpose to modern commerce.

He said:

We should establish a 9-foot depth in the trunk system. • • • We should complete the entire Mississippi system within the next five years.

That statement was made in 1929. In 1926, on July 20, just about six years ago on this day, in describing this trunk system, he said:

One of them is an east-and-west waterway across half the continent from Pittsburgh to Kansas City along the Ohio, Mississippi, and the Missouri Rivers, the other a great north-and-south waterway system across the whole Nation reaching up the Mississippi from the Gulf, dividing into two great branches, one to Chicago and extending then by the Lakes to Duluth, and the other the Upper Mississippi to the Twin Cities.

That was his opinion and statement in 1926, six years ago.

The year before, 1925, seven years ago, on October 19, while he was Secretary of Commerce, he made an address at Kansas City, in which he said:

There is one vital factor which must be made effective before these services can bring their results both in rates and in service to an important part of our Mid West agriculture and industry. That is, we must make these waterways into a full and completed transportation system by joining up their broken links. I can not insist too strongly upon the necessity of this full completion of the whole system, for every part bears a relation to every other part no matter how remote.

Again, on that occasion he said:

Our objective is of wider importance than the solely waterside transport. We aim to carry the benefits of cheaper transportation back into the hinterland, where goods must be gathered and distributed by rail and in which the rivers will form a connecting link of cheaper transportation. But before this can be effective the waterway link must be long enough to overcome the extra cost of loading from cars. That is, the cheaper rates of the water section must more than offset the cost of additional loading and reloading. And this only becomes possible when there are long water hauls. And we shall not have arrived at these long stretches of water in full measure until we have completed the whole Mississippi system of interconnected segments.

In the same address, delivered in 1925, seven years ago, he also said:

On the Mississippi system these engineering questions are behind us. We know what we should do. We know its vast benefits. We know it can be accomplished by a comparatively trivial cost compared to these benefits. We should go to it and have it completed within the next decade.

At Minneapolis, July 20, 1926, Mr. Hoover shortened this period to five years, and in his Louisville address, delivered October 23, 1929, Mr. Hoover, then President, stated:

We should complete the entire Mississippi system within the next five years.

When Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover said at Minneapolis, July 20, 1926:

We need a definite commitment to complete the whole system, including the links proposed in the present bill over a definite short term of years. By so doing our engineers can provide for equipment and contracts that will complete it at much less cost in time and money than by our tentative and gingerly handling of it all.

I might inform the Senate that General Brown stated that if a businesslike method of financing the construction of these inland waterways could be inaugurated, so that contracts could be let on a businesslike basis, the Corps of Engineers, he estimated, could save 25 per cent of the estimated cost of the building of these inland waterways and could complete the job within a comparatively short period of years, within about five years. He said he could economically spend in a businesslike program $100,000,000 in this fiscal year and $150,000,000 in every year after this and employ 160,000 men for five years, employing them for 120 days every season and complete the system.

When Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover said at St. Louis, Mo., November 22, 1926:

A unified, connected system with interconnection of the great Mississippi system and the Lakes is essential. Disconnected though improved segments are of no avail. The whole chain is only as useful as the weakest link.

As President, Mr. Hoover stated at Louisville, Ky., October 23, 1929:

We should complete the entire Mississippi system within the next five years. We shall then have built a great north-and-south trunk waterway entirely across our country from the Gulf to the northern boundaries, and a great east-and-west route halfway across the United States. Through the tributaries we shall have created a network of transportation. We shall then have brought a dozen great cities into direct communication by water; we shall have opened cheaper transportation of primary goods to the farmers and manufacturers over a score of States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For what purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. Did the President say when that was to be done?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In all of these statements he said, as long ago, I think, as in 1926, that they ought to be done within five years.

Mr. TYDINGS. It looks as if we are a little late getting under way.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am reading the President's statements. I will leave Senators to make their own interpretation.

BENEFITS RESULTING TO AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRY FROM IMPROVEMENT OF INLAND WATERWAYS

When Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover stated at Kansas City, October 19, 1925:

If we have back loading, 1,000 bushels of wheat can be transported 1,000 miles on the Great Lakes or on the sea for $20 to $30; it can be done on a modern-equipped Mississippi barge for $60 to $70, and it costs by rail from $150 to $200.

Mr TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it for granted from what the Senator has said that a part of the address of Mr. Hoover was in the nature of a campaign speech.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I would prefer that the Senator would put his own interpretation on the purpose for which it was made. I assume and believe that the speech was made in good faith. Facts were stated as he saw them as an engineer and as an economist.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may transgress a moment more, it would be interesting to know why nothing has been done and why the President has been quiescent on this subject so long, after having made such definite statements as to what ought to be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I can not answer the Senator. The President said:

These estimates are not based upon hypothetical calculations, but on the actual, going freight rates. The indirect benefits of the cheaper water transportation to the farmer are of far wider importance than the savings on individual shipments might indicate. In those commodities where we are depending upon exports for a market—and upon some domestic markets—the price level will be determined at the point where the world streams of that commodity join together in the great markets. Thus the price of wheat is made at Liverpool, and anything that we can save on transportation to Liverpool is in the long run that much in addition to the farmer's price. And it is not an addition solely to the actual goods which he may have shipped to that market, but it lifts the price level in our domestic market on the whole commodity in this same ratio. Thus if we can save from 5 to 7 cents a bushel additional by the completion of the Mississippi and Great Lakes systems we will have added a substantial amount to the income of every farmer in the Middle West.

When Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover stated, at St. Louis, November 22, 1926:

The necessary increase in railway rates is as if a series of tollgates around the Mid West have distorted the economic setting of this whole section. And to this is added the additional economic distortion due to the completion of the Panama Canal. It has thus become doubly urgent that we find a new and cheaper means of transportation for our bulk commodities if we are to relieve adverse pressures and maintain the equal advancement of all parts of our country. We can not without ruin to our railways reduce her rates to pre-war levels. We must find relief in our waterways, and we can rest with full confidence that the growth of the country will more than maintain railway traffic.

Nor are the economic benefits to be derived from completion of this great new system of river and lake ways limited to the actual savings made on particular goods which may be shipped. It is possible to demonstrate that great economic benefits would come to agriculture and industry even though there be but a minor part shipped by water, because of the potential effect upon the price of commodities.

He was not then talking about a system which has never been completed due to the wasteful methods of making appropriations and contracts, a practice under which for 40 years we have never had a completed system. He was talking then of a completed system. He said:

Taking many different Mid West points and calculating the rates by water on completed systems, there shows a cheapening of various amounts from 6 to 15 cents per bushel on wheat in the cost of delivery to Liverpool. Obviously, the Liverpool buyer would bid up to this margin in the price he offers, and his competitive bidding should lift the price of all the wheat in the region, whether the wheat actually went to Liverpool or not.

Nor is the importance to industry limited only to the amount of goods that would be carried over this transportation system. With the distortion of transportation rates resulting from the war and the Panama Canal, there has been a natural tendency of industry and commerce to migrate from the Midwest to seaboard.

This migration is exactly in the wrong direction. Sound national economy requires the establishment of industries nearer to our farmer consumers, for it gives both an immediate market to agricultural products and a large diversification of employment. Furthermore, if through cheaper transportation of raw materials we can give equal economic opportunity for the establishment of industry in the West, we shall secure a better distribution of population and a trend away from the growing congestion of our enormous urban centers.

As President, Mr. Hoover stated at Louisville, Ky., October 23, 1929:

Some have doubted the wisdom of these improvements. I have discussed the subject many times and in many places before now, and I shall not repeat the masses of facts and figures. The American people, I believe, are convinced. What they desire is action, not argument.

I might refer that statement of the President to his representatives at the convention in Chicago who wrote the Republican platform, and also to some members of his Cabinet, particularly to Mr. Mills and to Mr. Hurley.

When a bill was introduced in the Senate, a bill which I had the honor to introduce on behalf of the Mississippi Valley Association, a similar bill being introduced in the House by Mr. MANSFIELD, a measure which had the indorsement of the shippers, represented by a thousand delegates at St. Louis last November, two members of the Cabinet, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, wrote letters to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate in opposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I call his attention to the fact that when the President was making his campaign in east Tennessee in 1928 he told the people in that section of the country that he was in favor of having the Government develop Muscle Shoals, and the Cove Creek Dam in connection with it, but afterwards the President vetoed a bill designed to accomplish what he had recommended.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

At Kansas City on October 19, 1925, in advocating the speedy completion of the Mississippi system of inland waterways, Mr. Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, said:

We have learned that expenditures on great reproductive public works are neither a waste nor a burden upon the community. They bring a rich harvest in increasing wealth and greater happiness. They tend to strengthen the foundation of agriculture and industry. Even from the narrower point of view of taxation, they are an economy, for it is by such works that we increase the income available to taxation and thus reduce individual burdens.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Where was that statement of President Hoover made, and when?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When he was Secretary of Commerce he delivered an address at Kansas City on October 19, 1925. That was seven years ago.

At St. Louis, Mo., on November 22, 1926, he said:

I could not sum up our proposals better than to quote his [President Coolidge's] terse and lucid language in referring to these projects: "It is not incompatible with economy, for their nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which will be productive."

So we have the support at that time of President Coolidge and his then Secretary of Commerce, now President, Hoover.

Mr. NORRIS. But that was some time ago, was it not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That was in 1926, just seven years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a good deal like his statement referred to by the Senator from Tennessee about Muscle Shoals. That was made while he was out. He feels differently since he has gotten in.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Most people seem to feel differently after they get in. On October 23, 1929, at Louisville, Ky., Mr. Hoover said:

To carry forward all these great works is not a dream of the visionaries, it is the march of the Nation. We are reopening the great trade routes upon which our continent developed. This development is but an interpretation of the needs and pressures of population, of industry, and civilization.

Continuing, he said:

A nation makes no loss by devotion of some of its current income to the improvement of its estate. * * * It is our duty to make them [our waterways] available to our people.

However, here comes a little different note. On May 22, 1932, when the river and harbor section of the bill that happened to be before the Congress was being considered, the President in a letter to the American Society of Civil Engineers said—and this letter was given to the press on May 22, 1932:

> The vice in that segment of the proposals made by your society and others for further expansion of "public works" is that they include public works of remote usefulness; they impose unbearable burdens upon the taxpayer; they unbalance the Budget and demoralize Government credit. * * * Nonproductive "public works" in the sense of the term here used include * * * river and harbor improvements, * * * which bring no direct income and comparatively little relief to unemployment.

Let me read that last statement again:

> Nonproductive "public works" in the sense of the term here used include river and harbor improvements, which bring no direct income and comparatively little relief to unemployment.

When Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover said at Kansas City on October 19, 1925:

> We must conceive and attack their construction as a connected whole, not as a collection of disconnected lake and river projects.

Of course, the President realized that unless we change our point of view and attack their construction as a connected whole and not as a collection of disconnected lake and river projects appropriations for the development of inland waterways would simply continue a wasteful "pork-barrel" expenditure, as they have been in the last 30 or 40 years.

Mr. President, I have referred to the development of the inland waterways, and a plan to develop them on a businesslike basis, and have quoted from statements of the President of the United States while he was Secretary of Commerce, and also since he has been President, statements showing his clear comprehension of the vast benefits to accrue after these waterways were developed, and also his complete understanding of the necessity of completing the inland waterways within a period of five years. He made that statement as long as seven years ago.

On November 22, 1926, the President made a very excellent address in St. Louis, in which he said, referring to the past and also the present method of wasteful "pork-barrel" appropriations and methods of letting contracts:

> We have wasted vast sums of money in interrupted execution and sporadic and irresolute policies, until to-day we find ourselves with a mass of disconnected segments of a transportation system, the peacefulness of some of which from the noise of commerce furnished constant munitions of criticism to our opponents, but which in fact bears no more relation to the real possibilities of our waterways than would the New York Central Railroad if it has but a few stretches of stagecoach in its main trunk lines.
> If we are to substitute trains of steel barges on our rivers for box cars, we must not only have depth but we must have interconnection so that we may find employment for these box cars with diversified traffic meshing into the different seasons of the year. Without such a completed and interconnected transportation system we can not expect the most economic transportation on any one section; we can not expect that our waterways will perform their real function either as to cost of transportation or as to supply of sufficient craft, or the building up of sound transportation companies to take advantage of their opportunities. Nor without interconnection of our great Mississippi system with the Lakes will we realize the full values of either.

As President, Mr. Hoover stated at Louisville, Ky., October 23, 1929:

> Substantial traffic or public service can not be developed upon a patchwork of disconnected local improvements and intermediate segments. Such patchwork has in past years been the sink of hundreds of millions of public money.

Permit me to repeat that statement. Here is a statement by the President of the United States giving his opinion of our habitual year-to-year process of appropriating money for the development of inland waterways and the same system is in existence now under the President's so-called relief bill. Here is what he said:

> Such patchwork has in past years been the sink of hundreds of millions of public money.

When the President said that he told the truth. We have wasted hunderds of millions of dollars in this "pork-barrel" method of appropriating money for inland waterways. Because that method is continued with the support of the members of the President's Cabinet, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, is why I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the great disappointment of the people of the great Mississippi Valley that this program is continued of throwing away the taxpayers' money, in digging a river without completing the channel so that commerce may have the benefit of finished channels for transportation.

Those of us who have endeavored to carry out the program of the President have had no aid or comfort from the White House in stopping "pork-barrel" appropriations and completing a business-like job.

In 1928 the convention that nominated Mr. Hoover for the Presidency had a very excellent plank in their platform, a great promise to the people of the Mid West for relief from that economic degeneration that started after the passage of the transportation act. Here is what the Republican convention said in 1928 in the platform upon which Mr. Hoover became a candidate for the Presidency and upon which he was elected:

> Cheaper transportation for bulk goods from the Mid West agricultural sections to the sea is recognized by the Republican Party as a vital factor for the relief of agriculture. To that end we favor the continued development in inland and intracoastal waterways as an essential part of our transportation system.

Senators will notice that the Republican convention did not designate the development of inland waterways in 1928 as "pork." The platform continued:

> The Republican administration during the last four years initiated the systematic development of the Mississippi system of inland transportation lanes. It proposes to carry on this modernization of transportation to speedy completion. Great improvements have been made during this administration in our harbors, and the party pledges itself to continue these activities for the modernization of our national equipment.

In 1928, the Democratic Party had the following plank in their platform dealing with waterways:

> We favor the fostering and building up of water transportation through improvement of inland waterways and removal of discrimination against water transportation.
> We favor and will promote deep waterways from the Great Lakes to the Gulf and to the Atlantic Ocean.

In the absence of Republican support for the President's waterway program, Speaker GARNER included the President's program in the Speaker's relief bill. It came to the Senate under fire from the White House as a part of that bill and was taken out in conference under the pressure, it was said, of the threat of a veto by the President.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say to Senators who have done me the honor of listening to me that we have spent in the last 40 years $470,000,000 on the Mississippi River system. The only part of the tributaries of the Mississippi that has been completed, and the only part of the Mississippi that has been completed, is up to St. Louis from New Orleans. The Ohio River and its tributaries were completed a few years ago. It was estimated when the plans were laid for its construction that if it could be completed within 10 years it could be constructed for the sum of $60,000,000. But under the system of piecemeal appropriation, under the system of piecemeal letting of contracts, and under the system of "pork-barrel" appropriations for the benefit of contractors who seemed to want no development finished, it took 20 years to develop the Ohio River, and it cost $103,000,000. But in spite of that fact, having been completed, it carried 64,000,000 tons of freight last year, which is 24,000,000 tons more than was carried through the Panama Canal.

All of the Missouri River, the upper Mississippi, and the Tennessee, have not now and have not had any completed channels in spite of the fact that hundreds of millions of dollars have been wasted in so-called inland-waterway development. Because of these facts the people of the great Mississippi Valley, comprising 22 or 23 States, are greatly disappointed that the Congress of the United States and the administration, the representatives of the White House, have exerted their efforts to prevent a comprehensive scheme for financing, letting of contracts, and development of inland waterways so that the people of this vast inland empire might have the benefit of cheaper transportation and have the benefit of the great savings that could be accomplished if this development was carried out on a businesslike basis.

Think of the $470,000,000 invested in the last 40 years without any material return, without any material benefit except where completed. Think of the loss of interest on the money invested and that is unproductive because of this almost criminal system of "pork-barrel" waste of public funds. Can we wonder that the people are disappointed that the promises made to them have been forgotten? When is the Government of the United States going to keep its promises to the people? Either the system of development of inland waterways ought to be completed on a businesslike basis and save the taxpayers' money and give relief, or we ought to stop the appropriations because of their almost criminal waste of public funds.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed at the close of my remarks a statement issued on June 29 by Mr. C. C. Weber, president of the Upper Mississippi Barge Line Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

FATE OF UPPER MISSISSIPPI 9-FOOT CHANNEL PROJECT DEPENDS UPON PRESIDENT HOOVER

The people of the Northwest should know the status of legislation now in Congress having for its purpose a sound and economical plan for financing waterway improvements. The Shipstead-Mansfield bond bill, which was indorsed by the Mississippi Valley Association, the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, and all those sincerely interested in the speedy development of waterways throughout the country, was embodied in full in the national emergency relief bill which has passed the House. The Commerce Committee of the Sen te gave the waterways bond bill its approval; and the Senate relief bill, which has passed the Senate, embodies to an extent its provisions. Both bills are now being considered by Senate and House conferees; and the possibilities are that, if the administration withdraws its opposition, our waterway program will be embodied in the conference report and enacted into law.

The Mississippi Valley and the Northwest have a right to look to President Hoover for support in this particular matter. Before and after his election he was the outstanding advocate of waterway improvements as an aid to commerce, agriculture, and industry. In October, 1929, at Louisville, Ky., he declared for a 5-year construction program to complete the entire Mississippi system. The Shipstead-Mansfield bond bill is the only plan so far proposed that will carry out this program. The depression which followed that address emphasized the immediate need for these improvements not only in aid of commerce, agriculture, and industry, but as a means of relieving unemployment. Further than this, the Mid West has a special right to demand that its balanced trade relations destroyed by governmental action in the building of the Panama Canal be speedily restored through the improvement of the Mississippi Valley system of inland waterways. The duty to correct these distorted conditions without further delay rests with the Government responsible for their creation.

It is with amazement that the people of the Mid West read Mr. Hoover's statement of May 21, 1932, in which he termed river and harbor improvements nonproductive public works. Mr. Hoover, when Secretary of Commerce, traveled the length and breadth of this land advocating the improvement of waterways, including the Mississippi River system, on the premise that it would increase the income of every farmer in the Mid West from 5 to 10 cents per bushel on grains, revive industry, and restore the purchasing power of its people. At Minneapolis on July 20, 1926, he said:

"On the Mississippi system there are no unknown engineering questions. We know what we should do. We know its vast benefits; we know it can be accomplished by comparatively trivial cost compared with these benefits."

President Hoover stated as the policy of his administration that, "We should complete the entire Mississippi system within the next five years."

Three years have since elapsed and no adequate financial policy has been proposed by the administration to carry out its announced policy. The people of the Mississippi Valley and the Northwest have supported the Shipstead-Mansfield bond bill as the only practical financial plan yet proposed to carry out the President's program and this plan will be included in the conference report provided that the administration withdraws its opposition.

We feel in this emergency the public is entitled to the facts in order that the responsibility may be placed where it belongs in the event that this legislation, which means so much to the people of the Mississippi Valley, fails of enactment. This is not a political question. It is and should remain purely economic.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI BARGE LINE CO.,
C. C. WEBBER, President.

JUNE 28, 1932.

SOUTH FORK, FORKED DEER RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce Senate bill 4976, and I submit a report (No. 1001) thereon. This is a bridge bill which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is very anxious to have sent promptly to the House. There is no controversy about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It will take but a moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Will this interfere with the pendency of the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If done by unanimous consent, it will not.

The bill (S. 4976) granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the South Fork, Forked Deer River, on the Milan-Brownsville Road, State Highway No. 76, near the Haywood-Crockett County line, Tenn., was read, considered by unanimous consent, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the South Fork, Forked Deer River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, on the Milan-Brownsville Road, State Highway No. 76, near Haywood-Crockett County line, Tennessee, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

INVESTIGATION OF SHORT SELLING ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received and read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 276) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to make available and furnish such information in the possession of the Treasury and its various departments as may be called for and deemed necessary by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, or their duly authorized agents, pursuant to the investigation being conducted under Senate Resolution 84, as continued by Senate Resolution 239.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator explain to us the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. NORBECK. The resolution has reference to the investigation of the stock exchange. It will simply make available to the committee any Government records that the committee as such may believe they need in the Treasury Department, which would include the comptroller's office.

I have another resolution referring to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the Senator if the resolution would include the submission of income-tax returns to the committee?

Mr. NORBECK. I think it would.

Mr. REED. O Mr. President, that could be done only by act of Congress.

Mr. NORBECK. Then it does not include it.

Mr. REED. That is why I wanted to interpose the correction.

Mr. COUZENS. The purpose of the resolution, as I understood, was to secure the income-tax returns of some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, to ascertain whether they had not defrauded the Government. In other words, as I recall, the testimony submitted was to the effect that deductions for losses in the case of one firm were made by both the firm and the stockholders themselves. If the resolution does not include that I think it ought to, because it is my understanding that any committee of Congress is entitled to these records.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, by act of Congress those income-tax returns are made confidential, except from the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and from the Finance and Ways and Means Committees. That can be changed only by action of the two Houses of Congress, approved by the President. If that is the Senator's purpose—and I am in sympathy with it—he ought to make this a joint resolution, so that it will have the effect of modifying the present statute.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator explain to me, then, how the select committee of the Senate secured all the income-tax returns when the select committee was investigating the Bureau of Internal Revenue?

Mr. REED. I do not recall, Mr. President, excepting that the secrecy provision must have been enacted afterwards.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no. The committee kept them secret. The select committee, of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was chairman at one time, and later myself, kept all of these secret; but there was no joint resolution passed, and we had access to every single return, and there was none exposed. The Banking and Currency Committee intends to follow the same procedure in checking up to see whether these deductions have been made both by firms and by individuals.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with what the Senator from South Dakota is trying to do, and I think I have done my duty in calling his attention to the possible invalidity of his resolution; but I am perfectly willing to let him pass it for what it is worth.

Mr. NORBECK. All right; and I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have another resolution drafted to cover the specific matter that has been referred to here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I offer another resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received and read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 277) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is requested to make available and furnish such information in its possession as may be called for and deemed necessary by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, or their duly authorized agents, pursuant to the investigation being conducted under Senate Resolution 84 as continued by Senate Resolution 239.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

SILVER SITUATION—ANALYSIS BY SENATOR PITTMAN

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has prepared a very able and lucid analysis of the present silver situation. I am sure it will be considered of value by those who are interested in the silver question, which is indeed our monetary question. I ask that the analysis may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The analysis is as follows:

The silver plank in the Democratic platform is a victory for the Western States, which are both directly interested in the production of silver and in the export trade to China. The rehabilitation of silver, of course, is a world economic question which affects all international trade and commerce, and particularly that of the United States.

Before analyzing the effect of the promise with regard to silver contained in the Democratic platform it will be better instead if we quote the plank. It reads as follows:

"We advocate: A sound currency to be preserved at all hazards; and an international monetary conference called on the invitation of our Government to consider the rehabilitation of silver and related questions."

In the first place, the plank satisfies all sections of the country and those Democrats who had an abiding fear that the efforts toward the rehabilitation of silver meant some form of attack of a destructive nature upon our existing monetary system.

Again, it is emphatic in its promise that our Government, under a Democratic administration, will issue the invitation for an international conference, not alone "to consider * * * the position of silver," as stated in the Republican platform, but for "the rehabilitation of silver," as stated in the Democratic platform. The strongest promise carried in the plank, from the viewpoint of the West, is the unequivocal pronouncement in favor of the "rehabilitation of silver."

While shorter—and necessarily shorter—than the plank that I submitted on the subject to the platform committee, it follows closely and contains substantially all of the promises that I requested. I realized, when drafting the plank that I submitted, that it was the purpose of the committee to prepare and adopt a short platform, and that, in such event, details of promised legislation would be impossible.

Some of the friends of the rehabilitation of silver, not realizing the situation, might at first experience some disappointment. I am aware that some of the delegates from some of the silver-producing States advocated a much further advance than is expressed in the platform. They should not be disappointed at their failure. They have been far more successful than were western delegates to the Republican convention.

The Democratic plank discloses a sincere sympathy for the rehabilitation of silver and the determination that our Government shall take the initiative. Without such sincere sympathy, no platform pronouncement has any value or gives any assurance. This plank assures that a conference will be held in the United States, where it should be held. It insures that the representatives of our Government at such conference will be in sympathy with the purpose proposed to be obtained and will include representatives who are not only in sympathy with the purpose of bringing about the rehabilitation of silver but who understand the subject.

An amendment to the second deficiency appropriation bill providing $40,000 to defray the expenses of our Government in such conference has just been adopted. This will make it possible for the President to appoint Members of the Senate and House and economists in civil life as members of such a conference, in addition to representatives of the executive department. This is of great importance, as the financial and economic advisers of the present administration have disclosed that they are not in sympathy with any effort for the rehabilitation of silver.

It is to be hoped that the strong pronouncement in the Democratic plank will convince President Hoover of the expediency, if not the wisdom, of issuing the invitation for such a conference. Every Member of the United States Senate, as far as I know, is in favor of the calling of such a conference by our Government.

In February a year ago the Senate voted unanimously for a resolution introduced by me requesting the President to invite the other governments of the world to an international conference for the purpose "of having governments agree to abandon or suspend the policy and practice of debasing and melting up silver coins and disposing of the metal upon the markets of the world," and for the further purpose of agreeing upon the uses and status of silver as money.

Recently the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate reported favorably a bill introduced by me for the purchase by our Government of silver produced in the United States at the market price and with silver certificates. This bill will undoubtedly pass Congress unless the congested condition of emergency legislation prevents its consideration. By thus taking off of the markets of the world about the same amount of silver annually that is now being dumped by India through the melting up of silver coins, it will aid in the rehabilitation of silver. It will suggest one plan for the consideration of an international conference. There are many other plans that, of course, will be considered at such a conference.

The situation looks more encouraging than it ever has during the 19 years that I have been in the Senate.

REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PLANKS ON PROHIBITION

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the keynote speech of the chairman of the Prohibition National Convention held at Indianapolis, July 5–7, 1932, on the subject of the Republican and Democratic planks on prohibition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpt is as follows:

The Democratic liquor plank is perforated with corkscrews and bungholes. Not satisfied with repeal, it demands the nullification of the eighteenth amendment by an act of Congress permitting the manufacture and sale of preprohibition beer and "other alcoholic beverages" pending repeal.

If the Democratic Party carries the Congress and wins the Presidency on that plank, the eighteenth amendment is doomed and damned. The dry Democrats of the South must assume the responsibility for the return of the legalized liquor traffic if they support that platform.

If they were justified in rejecting Al Smith, and if they rejected him as they said they did, not on account of his religion but because he was wet, even when the platform and the vice presidential candidate was dry, how can they consistently support the ticket now, with both candidates and platform calling for repeal and nullification pending repeal?

We would prefer, if the legalized saloon is to come back, that it come back by a Catholic President than that it should return at the hands of a Protestant, whether High Church Episcopalian or Low Church Quaker.

A HOUSE DIVIDED

The Republican National Convention was divided into two camps, the wringing wets and the wobbling wets. Not a voice was heard but the voice of Esau, ready to sell the birthright of the party for a mess of wet politics. "When the country is teetering on an economic brink, all the Republicans can think about is whisky," said William Allen White at the Chicago convention. "It is grotesque that our sole interest here is in a bottle of booze."

The wringing wets were led by Butler, BINGHAM, and Wadsworth; the wobbling wets were led by the administration "yes men," Garfield, Mills, and Brown. The party not only adopted a repeal plank, it did worse. It proposes, without repealing the amendment, to allow the States by a majority referendum to decide whether they will come under the operation of the Constitution; to put into the Constitution a modifying substitute amendment that applies only to a part of the States while the original amendment will continue to apply to the others. It is what Raymond Robins and the dry leaders have been denouncing as "selective anarchy" for years.

GOOD LORD—GOOD DEVIL

James Francis Burke, general counsel for the Republican National Committee, says, "The plank is fair to both wets and drys, because the major principles of the prohibitionists are preserved and the major demands of the antiprohibitionists are met!" The drys who demand the maintenance of the amendment find that the party is opposed to repeal; the wets who demand repeal find that the party, while retaining the amendment in the Constitution, proposes by the adoption of a supplementary amendment "to allow the States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine" in a referendum election, thus to license the manufacture and sale of what the Constitution forbids!

Let us suppose that after the adoption of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery the Democratic Party had won the election on a plank permitting the former slave States to decide by a majority vote whether the thirteenth amendment should become operative in those States and that the Federal Government would pledge itself to protect such States in their choice, whether it was to abide by the thirteenth amendment and remain free, or rescind the thirteenth amendment and restore the institution of slavery in those States. That is the Republican liquor plank. "If there is no other name by which we may call it, let us call it treason."

The New York Times calls it "left-handed repeal," and says to get that "one has to cut through the worst jungle of verbiage that platform makers ever devised to conceal their thought." The Republican Herald Tribune says, "It includes retention and repeal, a Bratt system, a Quebec system, and a further beauty is none other than the essence of the famous Raskob-Smith plan."

There never was a clearer case of political larceny in American history. It is the Raskob-Smith liquor plank written into the Republican platform bodily. "Leave the eighteenth amendment in the Constitution exactly where it is and put a new amendment in the Constitution which will provide that nothing in the Constitution of the United States shall prevent any State from taking over complete control of manufacturing, transportation, importation, and sale of intoxicating beverages within its own territory," said Raskob at the Democratic National Committee meeting a year ago and at Boston and elsewhere since.

I denounced it as a treason against the Constitution then and I will not vote for it now.

"The Raskob plan, to my way of thinking, meets the prohibition question, * * * a proposal which shall allow any State to get from under the operation of the eighteenth amendment, after a plan approved by it in a popular referendum," said Al Smith in Boston last January and elsewhere.

And we dry Christians who damned Al Smith and supported Herbert Hoover in the last election are now asked to swallow that! Dressed in sheep's clothing and labeled "Republican," we are asked to accept it and give to it the sanction of our votes. Whoever does that owes an apology to Al Smith for what the Protestant pulpit did to him in the last presidential election. If now we support a wet Protestant of either party who stands for the same thing, we will brand ourselves as hypocrites before an accusing world.

THE HOOVER HOAX

It is worse than the Curtis hoax that betrayed Colonel Lindbergh while a guest at his table. The Republican ambidextrous, amphibious, and porus-plaster plank is capable of bending in either direction like a piece of whalebone. It takes off from dry land and cracks up in a still. It avoids the word repeal, but provides the method for repeal. It is the most pitiful example of ducking, dodging, and duplicity in the history of American politics. It is the most stupendous, titanic, colossal, calamitous, crimson, consciousless, barbaric, and cataclysmic fraud ever perpetrated upon the American people.

As Senator BORAH said in his speech in the Senate three days after its adoption, "It destroys the uniformity of the Constitution throughout the United States. It permits us to have a Constitution applying in one part of the country and not applying in another * * * it is nothing but legalized secession."

"The platform," the Senator says, "has but one definite, unmistakable proposition in it, and that is the repeal of the eighteenth amendment." And the association of organizations in support of the eighteenth amendment are asked to vote for that!

For the past six months the National United Committee has been campaigning in New England, calling upon the people in over 300 mass meetings to "stand by President Hoover" in his brave fight to uphold the Constitution, assuring them, as the President's friends have assured us, that he would not weaken in his support of the eighteenth amendment, proclaiming in half a thousand pulpits that our "unfinished task was to hold New England for the constitutional candidate in the November election," and that "Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut was the cockpit in the conflict." I owe to them an apology! And the President owes an apology to the cause which he has betrayed.

POLITICAL EXTREMITY IS PROHIBITION'S OPPORTUNITY

The enemies of national constitutional prohibition are divided into two wet camps. The hour has struck for a new political realignment of the patriotic voters of the country, uniting the drys of the Democratic South with the dry Republicans of the North into a solid phalanx of American patriots in defense of the Constitution as framed by the founders of the Republic and constitutionally amended by their successors, until, as Washington said in his Farewell Address, "It has been changed by the explicit and authentic act of the whole people."

In this hour of their division into two hostile camps there is the possibility of the election of a constitutional President by the united moral forces of the Nation. Moral revolutions do not require, and seldom if ever have received, the support of the majority. The election of Abraham Lincoln and the abolition of slavery did not come about through the support of the majority, but by the division of the proslavery Democratic opposition. Abraham Lincoln was a plurality President, lacking one million and a half of having a majority. The same was true of our World War President, Woodrow Wilson, who was elected by a division of the opposition into two separate camps, and lacked more than two and a half million votes of having a majority.

If those national dry organization and those militant religious denominations which have repeatedly warned the President and the Republican Party of the penalty they would pay if they betrayed the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution make good their threats and prove that their professions of loyalty to prohibition were not empty words, if they will show their faith by their votes and carry out their expressions of devotion and the punishments which they have again and again declared they would impose, the next President of the United States will be a dry candidate of their choice.

The Prohibition Party offers them such a candidate and stands pledged to withdraw him for Senator BORAH or any other candidate on a dry platform that the association of organizations in support of the eighteenth amendment will name. The responsibility is theirs. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JULY 14, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. J. R. Duffield, secretary of the Washington Presbytery, offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, we rejoice to know that we are in Thy presence; and that as we face the transactions of the affairs of state we face them as Thy servants. Rejoicing as we do in the privileges, and even the responsibilities, that are committed unto us, grant unto us Thy guidance in whatever we do. We thank Thee, O God, that we know who Thou art; that in Thy strength Thou hast ministered to us in the hours of our weakness; that in our sins and in our wandering we have always been certain of Thy forgiveness. As Thou art and always will be unto us, help us to be to each other until the spirit of love and fraternity and fellowship and cooperation shall spread throughout this land of ours. We pray Thee, O Father, that in all things we shall do Thy will as Thou dost give us to see our duty. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSPORTATION FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I call up a resolution (H. J. The Clerk read the title of the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the House joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CONFEREES—HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I was appointed as a member of the committee of conferees on the home loan bank bill, representing the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], a member of our committee, was a member of the subcommittee which prepared the bill and has done an immense amount of work upon it. I ask unanimous consent that my name be stricken from the committee of conferees and the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] placed thereon in my stead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that he may be excused from serving as a conferee on the home loan bank bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] to fill the vacancy on the conference committee, and the Clerk will inform the Senate of the change in conferees.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting remarks supplementary to those I made on Tuesday, giving a list of contributors to the Republican campaign fund who have been granted refunds on income taxes from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will include a list of the parties who have contributed to the Democratic campaign fund along with it, I will not object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If I can find any Democrats who have received refunds——

Mr. SNELL. Not any "ifs" about it. If the gentleman will put it all in, I will not object. Otherwise I will.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If there are any Democrats who have been so fortunate as to get refunds, I will put them in.

Mr. SNELL. I want it perfectly understood that it will be a complete history of the whole proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As far as I can make it.

Mr. SNELL. No; not as far as the gentleman can make it, but I want the whole proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Sinclair leads the list, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. It does not make any difference. I want the entire list in. Unless the gentleman thinks he can put in the entire list, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

DEPARTMENTS OF AGRICULTURE, POST OFFICE, TREASURY, AND WAR APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I call up a resolution (H. J. Res. 474) making available as of July 1, 1932, the appropriations contained in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1933 for the Departments of Agriculture, Post Office, Treasury, and War, and ratifying obligations incurred in anticipation thereof, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriations and authority with respect to appropriations contained, respectively, in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, for the Department of Agriculture, the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, shall be available from and including July 1, 1932, for the purposes respectively provided in such appropriations and authority for the service of such fiscal year. All obligations incurred during the period between June 30, 1932, and the respective dates of enactment of each of such acts in anticipation of such appropriations and/or authority are hereby ratified and confirmed if in accordance with the terms thereof.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply refers to those three appropriation bills which were not finally passed until after the beginning of the fiscal year.

It is thought that a resolution of this kind should be passed in order to make these bills retroactive to July 1, in order that no complications or questions may arise hereafter in the action of the comptroller with reference to the expenditures authorized therein.

In order that the RECORD may show that the delay with reference to these bills was not due to any fault on the part of the House, I call attention to the fact that the House passed the Agriculture Department appropriation bill on January 27; that it passed the Treasury and Post Office Departments' bill on March 5; and the War Department bill was passed by the House upon May 19, which was the last regular appropriation bill for the fiscal year.

The second deficiency bill was passed by the House upon June 3. These bills became laws on the following dates: The agriculture appropriation act was approved July 7; the Treasury and Post Office act was approved on July 5; the War Department appropriation act was finally concluded by both Houses upon July 13.

Similar action has been taken in the past with respect to other appropriation bills. At the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the Agricultural, Army, District of Columbia, Navy, and sundry civil appropriations acts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and the third deficiency act, fiscal year 1919, failed to become law by July 1, 1919. A resolution similar to the one accompanying this report was enacted making the appropriations contained in such acts available from and including July 1, 1919, and ratifying the obligations incurred during the period such activities were without funds.

The naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922 was not approved until July 12, 1921, and a joint resolution was enacted making the funds in that bill available as of July 1, 1921, and ratifying obligations incurred during the period between June 30, 1921, and the date of the enactment of the appropriations.

The District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1931 was not approved until July 3, 1930, and in that instance a provision was included in the bill making the funds available as of the beginning of the fiscal year and ratifying and confirming the obligations incurred during the interim.

The committee is of the opinion that the accompanying joint resolution should be enacted in order that the appropriations in these acts may be available without question for the payment of all obligations incurred from and including July 1, 1932, if in accordance with the appropriations and authority with respect to appropriations as contained in the several acts.

I have simply made this statement in order that the RECORD may show just when the House acted upon these bills in the first instance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Naturally, there can be no objection to the resolution. It is the proper thing to do.

The point I desired to make at the end of June was that I felt that under our form of government, the only check the people have on the Executive is the power of appropriation. This being so it was my belief and my opinion that on the 30th day of June we should have passed a resolution maintaining these departments pending the passage of the appropriation bill. We should have done it for this reason: To indicate the intent of Congress to carry on these departments. I submit that if Congress purposely refused to appropriate for any department of the Government the Executive would not be empowered to continue that department in existence. This is our check and the only control the people have.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand, but, of course, there was no idea that any department would be interfered with because it was expected these bills would be passed in a few days.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. BYRNS. And there was a good reason for not passing a continuing appropriation at that time for the few days intervening for the reason that every one of these bills have been very sharply reduced in appropriations for the year 1933 over what they were for 1932 and, therefore, money has been saved by adopting this method.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is very true, but in the interim I feel those departments had no real legal or constitutional existence.

Mr. BYRNS. That may be true, but this corrects it, if the gentleman is right.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAY OF PAGES

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I call up House Joint Resolution 475 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Tennessee going to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised there is an amendment which will be offered if consent is given.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the House joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary to provide for the payment of 21 pages for the Senate and 41 pages for the House of Representatives at the rate provided by law from July 16 to July 31, 1932, both dates inclusive.

With the following committee amendment:

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to five minutes on the affirmative side, and the gentleman from Nebraska may have the same time in opposition. If the gentleman from Tennessee does not desire five minutes on the affirmative side of the amendment, then the gentleman from Nebraska may be recognized for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time this morning in order to discuss briefly with the membership of the House a proposal I believe will be of interest generally to them.

I think all the membership of the House at different times in their work with the Veterans' Bureau and the present Veterans' Administration have had cases of service men asking for compensation, asking for disability allowances, asking for a determination of their right to hospitalization, asking for pensions, in which they have felt the bureau was wrong in its decisions. I have had such cases. There are other cases in which quite clearly the Government has not been satisfied with the decisions that have been made.

It is fundamental, as I see it, under our theory of Government that every citizen has the right to a judicial determination of the law and the facts with relation to any claim he has against any citizen or against the Government.

In my judgment there ought to be some tribunal whereby a veteran who is dissatisfied with the awards of the Veterans' Bureau in his pension case, in compensation, or disability allowance cases, or the right to hospitalization has an appeal. The appeal should be to some board or tribunal, not an administrative board under the control of the Veterans' Administration.

On January 24, 1930, I introduced H. R. 9112, a bill providing for the creation of a board or court to consider the border-line or disputed cases. It was referred to as an equity court. The passage of the disability-allowance legislation precluded consideration of that proposal at that time. The situation now calls for some change or relief from the present condition.

I have to-day introduced House Joint Resolution 477, which has been somewhat hastily drawn. Obviously it is not perfect, but I am introducing it with the thought in mind of calling it to the attention of the membership of the House and of the veterans' organizations of the country to the suggested plan of setting up, independent of the Veterans' Administration, a board of appeals to which veterans and the Government may appeal these cases, similar in a way to the Board of Tax Appeals, that now decides controversial tax matters in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I am calling it to the attention of the membership of the House for study and constructive suggestions as to the plan involved in the resolution, and generally with relation to the underlying need for some judicial decision of this mass of cases that are now administratively decided in the Veterans' Bureau, and from which decisions there is now no appeal under present procedure.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman said a judicial decision. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to establish a judicial body to hear these appeals?

Mr. SIMMONS. You may call it a court; you may call it a board; but the underlying purpose is to have some tribunal whose function it is to decide the questions of law and fact more as a judicial matter than as an administrative matter, as is now done.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. After all, it will be nothing but an administrative body, I think the gentleman will admit. Unless you have a court you are not going to have a judicial determination.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman from Illinois has made a suggestion. Whether you call it a court or a board it will be a determination of the facts and the law. It will be a board to which the veteran may go with his representative and have these questions submitted to this tribunal, call it a board or call it a court, and there have a decision based on those facts.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But if it is merely an administrative body it is only another step along the line of consideration, determination, and adjudication that you have now in the Veterans' Bureau, and it simply means one more step along the line of bureaucratic determination.

Mr. SIMMONS. Unfortunately the bill has not been printed, but I have safeguarded that. The bill provides specifically that there shall be an independent board and it also provides that the Veterans' Bureau shall abolish existing boards whose functions will not now be needed.

We ought to have something in the nature of a judicial determination, where the veteran has a right to appeal, where he has a right to appear, and where he has a right to submit the questions of law and fact involved in his case and get a decision.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEGER. In the setting up of this board does the gentleman contemplate having veterans on the board?

Mr. SIMMONS. The board which I contemplate setting up would be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as are other boards of like character.

Mr. SEGER. And does the gentleman provide that veterans shall be on that board?

Mr. SIMMONS. Naturally veterans should be on that board.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOUSER. I am very much interested in the gentleman's proposition and think that by all means it should be adopted. We all know that interrelated boards are naturally going to be sympathetic with the lower tribunal that is included in the same set-up and the tendency is to confirm the decision of the lower tribunal. There are many boards to which these claims for compensation and disability allowances can be appealed but as a matter of fact they very rarely overrule the inferior tribunal because of the natural sympathy which exists between them. We should have an independent board to which an appeal can be taken and independent decisions rendered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not only that, but the veteran whose case has been disallowed feels he has been discriminated against because of the situation which the gentleman describes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, a number of Members are on their feet desiring to ask questions, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not a fact that if the Congress would use language that would more clearly set out its intent as to the veterans' act, there would be practically no use for a board such as the gentleman advocates?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not agree with the gentleman at all. It is not so much the fault of the law but it is the fault of administrative bodies deciding matters wherein too often they are both prosecutor, defense attorney, witness, judge, and jury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is the fault of the law in a great many cases, because we leave it to the department to adopt regulations rather than writing it into the law itself. The department in some instances does not follow the intent of Congress owing to the nature of the regulations.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the fact remains that the veteran wants a place where he can get a judicial determination of his claim.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. The gentleman always has a very sympathetic and attentive concern in all matters affecting the veteran.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Would the findings of this board be final or would there be a further appeal?

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be final unless it could be reopened, as I think it should be, in the event new evidence could be submitted.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But there would be no other appeal?

Mr. SIMMONS. There would be no appeal beyond this board under my proposal.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman's idea might serve a very good purpose and eliminate some of the appeals and mistakes now being made. How would the gentleman prevent a new crop or a new variety of lawyers coming up, appearing before this board and soliciting cases?

Mr. SIMMONS. That can be prevented, and there is in the present draft of the bill a provision to the effect that while lawyers may appear they can not be given any awards except those approved by the board and not to exceed 5 per cent of the initial award of the board.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That might prevent abuses.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would prevent lawyers from going out and scalping these cases. I submit the proposition to the House for its consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to my friend that I have no objection to his consuming five minutes but I was permitted to bring up these resolutions on the promise that they would not take very long. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this resolution and all amendments thereto be concluded in six minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to speak?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish to discuss the same board that the gentleman from Nebraska has been discussing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the question of the resolution to be introduced to-day by the gentleman from Nebraska and myself is entirely nonpartisan and entirely nonpolitical. The resolution is introduced solely that the new committee formed by the House under the substitute to the economy bill offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] and adopted by the House may have before it the desire to have in the Government a board something like the Board of Tax Appeals, where the average service man and the Government also may have a judicial board which can render a final conclusive decision in compensation and disability allowance service cases.

All of you who have presented these cases to the Veterans' Administration during all of the years since the war know that the presentation of a service man's case is an interminable matter. There are in the bureau file after file of cases with thousands and thousands of sheets in them. There may be a final determination, and yet the filing of one more affidavit reopens the case, makes more overhead and administrative expense and dissatisfies the veterans.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] and myself have felt that there is a fundamental right in the United States for every person to have a judicial determination of his rights. It is our form of government. We recognize the judiciary, whether you call it something like the Board of Tax Appeals or a board such as we provide in the bill to be to-day introduced. We recognize the fact that this board will thoroughly go into every phase of the matter, will become fully advised as to the situation and we believe that here is a forward step that may be taken in the determination of veterans' cases. We believe it will result in stricter justice to the Government and stricter justice to the service man. It has been drawn with the idea that the principles of equity will apply rather than the strict principles of law.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. One thing that would follow, if such a tribunal were established, would be a judicial interpretation of the laws that we have passed, which might get around certain regulations that the department has promulgated.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would not want to go so far as to say that. I would say that this board, being appointed for a number of years, being divorced entirely from the Veterans' Bureau and being at least a semijudicial body, would be better equipped to decide these matters than a purely executive board.

Mr. MOUSER. If the gentleman will permit one further question, assuming that the attorney fee is limited to 5 per cent of the amount of recovery, how much would an attorney draw in the case of a disability allowance which would be payable for the life of the beneficiary or as long as the disability lasted?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I may say to the gentleman that I do not think there will be much attorney fees. If the gentleman knew the history of pension legislation as I know it, and the attempts that have been made to write into the veterans' administration laws provisions that would have provided $10,000,000 of attorneys' fees, I believe the gentleman would agree with me that they should practically be eliminated. The veterans' organizations and the veterans will secure their justice without there being a great amount of attorneys' fees.

Mr. MOUSER. In that event, the tribunal would fix the fee, would it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would not go so far as to say that there should be a fee. There is no fee provided for under the present law, and we have not contemplated changing the present law in that regard except as to the 5 per cent fee of the first payment.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman speaking has been for many years interested in legislation on behalf of the World War veterans. I would be pleased if the gentleman could give us as much information as he can as to the prospects of securing final enactment of the bill providing a pension for the widow of a World War veteran, whose husband's death was not of service origin.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I voted against that bill when it was before the House. It is now in the Senate, as the gentleman knows, and I have no way of knowing what may be in the minds of gentlemen in the other body.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. This board, as the gentleman has said, will be supposed to apply the principles of equity in so far as the veterans are concerned, and I will be in favor of anything that will help us to get these cases fixed up properly, but if we have the same success in the future that we have had in the past with the present ratings board, then we might as well throw the whole thing out of the window.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Under the proposed legislation some of the existing boards will be abolished.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now take up bills on the Consent Calendar, unobjected to, beginning at the point where we left off on yesterday.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he contemplates taking up the Private Calendar at any time soon.

Mr. BYRNS. I have not charge of that. My request relates only to the Consent Calendar.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, under the gentleman's request, bills will not be stricken from the calendar, if objected to, but will retain their place on the calendar?

Mr. BYRNS. I think that is the understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is to be the same order under which we proceeded yesterday, I assume.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The Clerk called the first resolution on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement, House Joint Resolution 434, a joint resolution to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to provide additional facilities for the classification of cotton under the United States cotton standards act, and for the dissemination of market-news information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

TO STOP INJURY TO PUBLIC GRAZING LAND

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 11816, a bill to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Upon request of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

H. R. 297—AN APPEAL FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND FREEDOM OF THOUGHT

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as the first session of the Seventy-second Congress is drawing to a close without definite action having been taken on my bill (H. R. 297) to conform naturalization procedure to the American Bill of Rights, I feel that I ought to make some statement as to its purpose and its present status for the information of the Membership of the House.

Such a statement is due, not only to my own self-respect, but as a matter of grateful acknowledgment to the thousands of unselfish Americans who have come voluntarily to the support of a measure which they regard and I regard as based upon the foundations of true democracy and true Americanism.

Mr. Speaker, it seems strange at this late day for a Member of the House of Representatives of this great and cultured Nation to be obliged to lift his voice in behalf of religious liberty and freedom of thought. Those are principles in the structure of the American system of government which we usually take for granted—assuming that they were settled and ineradicably fixed in our Constitution when the Bill of Rights was adopted. Yet so deeply are the atavistic primitive instincts embedded in the human race that, notwithstanding the progress of science, the widespread prevalence of education, and the general advance of culture and civilization, there persistently appears, at intervals, strange revivals of medievalism. Race prejudice and bigotry manifest themselves with all their pristine venom, lifting their slimy heads to threaten with their poisonous fangs the very life sap of civilization.

When the United States made its appearance among the family of nations, the intelligent and far-seeing statesmen, who framed our Constitution, had in their mind's eye a long and doleful history of the evils of race prejudice and religious intolerance. Therefore, in drawing up the document which was to be the organic law of our Nation, they took particular pains to see that it would become not only a framework of government but a great charter of human liberty.

WHAT THE CONSTITUTION SAYS

In the body of the instrument therefore we find this basic guaranty:

Article VI, section 3: No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

I implore your particular attention to that language and pray you to keep it in mind during this argument. You will be called upon to weigh in your mind the question whether it could have been the intention of the founders to prohibit a religious test for office holding and yet insist upon such a test for simple citizenship. You will ask yourself, "Is not citizenship a public trust?" And, if you are a true American, you will conclude that it is no more proper to insist upon a religious test for citizenship than it is for office holding.

Notwithstanding the plain import of this language, the framers of our Constitution strove to make "assurance doubly sure," and the very first amendment emphasized the importance of the question by the use of the following language:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging freedom of speech or of the press.

The clear import of these two specific guaranties of human liberty is that they were intended to be universal in their application; in other words, that they should apply without exception to every inhabitant of the United States, to wit, that the same principle which prohibited religious tests for officeholders would prohibit religious tests for those seeking citizenship, and that if freedom of thought and of speech was to be guaranteed to native-born citizenship it must of necessity be guaranteed to every inhabitant of the United States, whether native born or naturalized.

THE NATURALIZATION OATH

Accordingly Congress prescribed a form of oath to be administered to intending citizens, wherein the alien is called upon "to support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic," and "bear true faith and allegiance to the same"; and that he or she would "take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion."

For over a hundred years aliens were naturalized upon expressing their willingness to take this oath. No attempt was made to analyze or enlarge it. It was taken for granted that if the naturalized citizen were willing to support and defend the Constitution, he or she would do so in such manner, in such place, and by such means as Congress and the laws made by Congress might direct.

QUESTION NO. 22 (LATER NO. 24)

But the great World War came on and evoked an extraordinary manifestation of hysteria. The Bureau of Naturalization seems to have been bitten by the bug and decided to elaborate the term "support and defend the Constitution and laws," notwithstanding Congress gave it no such authority. Upon its own responsibility about nine years ago the bureau inserted in the questionnaire addressed to intending citizens this broad, general question:

22. If necessary, are you willing to take up arms in defense of this country?

This question has since been asked of all applicants, irrespective of age, sex, or condition of health. Grave judges and, presumably, sane and intelligent clerks of the Naturalization Bureau have been required to ask this foolish hypothetical question of females of every age, although women were never expected to take up arms in any of our wars. They even asked it of old men, beyond the age of military service, and of the lame, the blind, and the crippled. If it were not so serious in its consequences, it would be laughable. What a fertile field for the cartoonist. A regiment of the blind, the lame, the crippled, and the aged—all with guns in their hands and banners waving: "We swore to take up arms in defense of the country, and we're doing it!"

If the question were framed along the line of ascertaining from the applicant if he or she would render such service in defense of the country in time of war as Congress might require, it might not be objected to; but, even at that, any inquiry as to what a person thinks he or she may do at some time in the future is hypothetical and absurd. It does not matter what they think. As "citizens" they must obey the law.

The working out of this question has shown its utter stupidity and folly. This question No. 22 or, as it later became, "question No. 24," has been given a ridiculously, bloodthirsty meaning, particularly in the case of professional nurses, the inquisitors hurling at them the question "if they would shoot to kill" and a host of other foolish questions.

DANGEROUS IMPLICATIONS

The arrogation of the power by the Bureau of Naturalization without the authority of Congress, to interpret and enlarge the terms of the oath of allegiance is pregnant with dangerous implications, threatening the guaranties of religious liberty, and freedom of thought. First of all, there are three large religious bodies—the Quakers, Mennonites, and Dunkards—of well-recognized patriotism and civic virtue, whose discipline and teachings are decidedly against war. Their attitude was recognized and respected in the selective service act, which exempted from the draft all persons who are found to be members of any well-organized sect then existing "whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form."

Not only that, but the following States of the Union have provisions in their respective constitutions specifically exempting from military duty all persons "whose conscientious scruples forbid them to bear arms." I will insert the table here.

QUESTION NO. 24 REALLY BECOMES A RELIGIOUS TEST

To permit a bureau of our Government to ask any question whatever which touches the religious views or conscientious scruples of an applicant for citizenship is tantamount to a religious test and a restraint on freedom of thought in violation of the guaranties of our Constitution. It means that the avenues of citizenship are to be forever closed to those persons whose religious views or philosophical opinions happen not to meet the approval of the bureau or coincide with its interpretation of the obligations of citizenship.

IT IS NOW UP TO CONGRESS

Unfortunately, the United States Supreme Court in several decisions has upheld the action of the Bureau of Naturalization, but in each case by a divided court. The question is by no means settled, and it is now up to Congress to put its own interpretation on the term "defend the Constitution."

When the Schwimmer case was decided in May, 1929, I was particularly struck with the dissenting opinion of the Hon. Oliver Wendell Holmes, which was concurred in by Justice Brandeis and the late Justice Sanford.

Justice Holmes, let it be emphasized, was far from being a pacifist. He served all through the Civil War and bears on his body the scars of three wounds he received in hard-fought battles. Mrs. Schwimmer was a woman 50 years of age. She was an author and lecturer and entertained strong pacifistic views, and believed that "war will disappear and that the impending destiny of mankind is to unite in peaceful leagues." Justice Holmes gave utterance to this classic comment:

> The notion that the applicant's optimistic anticipations would make her a worse citizen is sufficiently answered by her examination, which seems to me a better argument for her admission than any that I can offer. Some of her answers might excite popular prejudice, but if there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate. I think that we should adhere to that principle with regard to admission into as well as to life within this country.
> And recurring to the opinion that bars this applicant's way, I would suggest that the Quakers have done their share to make the country what it is, that many citizens agree with the applicant's belief, and that I had not supposed hitherto that we regretted our inability to expel them because they believe more than some of us do in the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount.

THE GRIFFIN BILL

The day following the handing down of this historic decision I introduced a bill known as H. R. 3547, Seventy-first Congress, first session. It was the same in substance as H. R. 297, introduced in the current session, except that in the last paragraph of the new bill the following explanatory phrase was added: "but every alien admitted to citizenship shall be subject to the same obligations as the native-born citizen."

[H. R. 297, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

A bill to provide that religious views or philosophical opinions against war shall not debar aliens, otherwise qualified, from citizenship

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth subdivision of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, and establishing the Bureau of Naturalization," approved June 29, 1906, as amended March 2, 1929 (Public, No. 962, 70th Cong., sec. 6 (b)), is amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following new sentence: "Except that no person mentally, morally, and otherwise qualified shall be debarred from citizenship by reason of his or her religious views or philosophical opinions with respect to the lawfulness of war as a means of settling international disputes, but every alien admitted to citizenship shall be subject to the same obligations as the native-born citizen."

WIDE INDORSEMENT OF THE BILL

Instantly, upon the introduction of this bill, I became the recipient of hundreds of commendatory letters from the clergy of all denominations, professors of law and history, and civic workers and organizations. The Scripps-Howard, the Hearst papers, and the most influential newspapers and magazines in the country published spirited editorials in its approval.

The Reverend Henry S. Coffin, president of the Union Theological Seminary, wrote me in this strong language:

> I do not see how, in the light of our American history, it is possible to make willingness to bear arms a requisite for citizenship. When one recalls the great service to our Nation by such religious bodies as the Quakers and when one realizes that in other Christian communions there have been noteworthy individuals who have been both loyal patriots and conspicuous servants of the commonweal while conscientiously opposed to participation in war, it seems absurd not to make proper provision for this group in our citizenship.
> An interpretation of the Constitution has been made by our courts which would rule out William Penn and many more of his persuasion. It is high time that Congress rectified this matter. We can not unwrite the past, and surely the future ought to be made congruous with a very noble element in our history which safeguards the liberty of conscience for the individual.

I also quote from a letter of Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick:

> From the days of the American Revolution, when the Quakers of Pennsylvania rendered such loyal service to the national cause, people of that faith have been among the great builders of our commonwealths.
> I understand that legislation is being considered which will do away with this barricade that now prevents the naturalization of conscientious objectors. I am writing to express my cordial approval of such legislation and my satisfaction that you are proposing it. I trust that success may come to a liberal Americanism which has always been cautious about any attitude involving the invasion of private and conscientious judgment.

I cull this choice extract from a very interesting letter written me by Guy Franklin Hershberger, professor of history in Goshen College:

> If alien advocates of peace who come to our shores are undesirable as citizens, then it must follow that those peaceful people who have lived here for two and one-half centuries are bad citizens as well. Sixteenth century Europe regarded the Mennonites as bad citizens, with the result that thousands of them suffered martyrdom. To-day Soviet Russia regards these same peaceful, religious Mennonites as bad citizens and deals with them in true sixteenth-century fashion. And the logical conclusion of the recently adopted American policy would be, it would seem, to declare these peaceful Christians now among us undesirable and refuse to tolerate them any longer. Would America follow in the footsteps of Soviet Russia?

INDIVIDUAL INDORSERS

Among the individual indorsers of the bill are to be found some of the most distinguished men and women of to-day. Without making any invidious distinction, I will only dare to mention these: Jane Addams, Carrie Chapman Catt, Fannie Hurst, Katherine Devereaux Blake, Harriet Stanton Blatch, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Lillian D. Wald, Mary E. Woolley, Alice Stone Blackwell, Helen Tufts Bailie, Prof. Harry Elmer Barnes, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, Dr. Stephen S. Wise, Prof. Zachariah Chaffee, jr., Arthur Garfield Hays, Rev. John Haynes Holmes, Dr. George W. Kirchwey, Don Seitz, Prof. James T. Shotwell, Prof. F. W. Taussig, Dean Clarke of Yale, Prof. Laswell of Chicago, Prof. Felix Frankfurter, William A. Neilson, Hon. John W. Davis, and Oswald Garrison Villard. There are scores of others who ought to be included in this roll of honor, but their names appear in the hearings on the bill.

GRIFFIN BILL COMMITTEE

Entirely without my knowledge groups of educated and enlightened men and women throughout the country organized associations to advance the movement to conform our naturalization laws to the guaranties of the United States Constitution. Branches were established in all the large cities and a national Griffin bill committee was organized under the presidency of Mrs. Lola Maverick Lloyd, a descendant of Revolutionary forefathers. She resides in Chicago. She is still in office. The former secretary, Miss Elizabeth Black, after having performed splendid work, was compelled, out of consideration for her health, to resign. She is succeeded by Mr. Alfred Lief, an author of distinction, who is a great admirer of Justice Holmes and who published the latter's dissenting opinions as a labor of love. The work has had an extraordinary popularity.

THE HEARINGS ON H. R. 3547

Having the backing of intelligent public opinion, I demanded a hearing on the bill. The first hearing was held on May 8, 9, 1930, under the chairmanship of the Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, whose hostility to aliens of all kinds is well known, and with him, perhaps, a matter of pride. The friends of the bill were heckled outrageously, and everything was done to confuse and misinterpret the purpose of the bill. He persisted in insisting to the end that the bill was intended to allow candidates for citizenship to take the oath "with certain reservations," and even gave the hearings that misleading title. Let us pass over the "hearing" in silence.

THE HEARING ON H. R. 297

On Tuesday, January 26, 1932, another hearing was granted on the bill by the new chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the Hon. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN. All who attended the hearing unite in extending to him their heartfelt appreciation of his fairness and intelligent acumen.

The witnesses for the bill, however, did not escape the usual discourtesies from the opponents of the bill, whose position on the committee protected them from any counterattack. They were virulent, venomous, and unreasonable. The former chairman, the Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, of Washington, was in his best heckling form and he was ably seconded by the Hon. ROBERT A. GREEN, of Florida, MARTIN DIES, of Texas, ARTHUR M. FREE, of California, and the Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS, of Ohio.

FLAG WAVERS TO THE FRONT

Both hearings brought to the front a number of so-called patriots who deliberately persisted in misrepresenting the aim and purpose of the bill. They charged that its object was to admit aliens into the country—although it has nothing whatever to do with immigration. The bill, of course, deals only with those aliens who are here and who have been lawfully admitted.

They charged that its purpose was, not only to invite communists into the country, but to allow them to take the oath of allegiance without assuming the obligation to bear arms. Just the merest tittle of reflection would have made it apparent to them that all the dangerous foreign elements—communists, anarchists, and bolshevists—have not the slighest aversion to war or to the shedding of human blood and that if they entertained the thought that question No. 24 was going to act as a barrier to the admission of such aliens they were grossly mistaken.

In drafting this bill my purpose was to conform the naturalization laws to the bill of rights. The language was plain. The object was clearly in keeping with traditional American ideals. But the flag-waving fanatics who attacked the bill resorted to lies and distortion.

Their armory was void of logical arguments, so they had to drape themselves with spurious patriotism. In so doing they witlessly stepped into the rôle of bolshevistic tyranny.

Freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and the free exercise of religion are approved by these professional patriots only if the applicant for citizenship accepts their particular brand.

I assumed that everyone knew that those who had been denied citizenship because of their religious or philosophical views on war were willing to take the oath of allegiance "to defend the Constitution and the laws." In this I was mistaken. It was falsely and maliciously represented that those rejected had refused to take the oath of allegiance and wanted to qualify it and secure exemption from service in case of war. Such an idea was preposterous.

THE PATRIOTEER'S PUZZLE

How can anyone avoid the obligations of a citizen by becoming a citizen? Yet these scatterbrained fanatics kept echoing and reechoing the statement:

These aliens want to get the advantages of our citizenship without its obligations.

They never even paused long enough in their propaganda to reflect that a citizen is a citizen no matter how he attains that status and that, even if he or she wanted to, no alien could become a citizen without assuming all of the obligations of citizenship. Not only that, but to still their pretended fears, I even added that guaranty at the end of the new bill.

They failed to realize that Congress has never surrendered, and is never likely to surrender, its jurisdiction over the duties of citizens in time of war, and that citizens, however created, are and always will be amenable to the direction of Congress as to when, where, how, and in what capacity they shall function in time of war.

AUTHORIZING DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC BUILDING TO EMPLOY LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTS, ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 10372, to authorize the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks to employ landscape architects, architects, engineers, artists, or other expert consultants.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I am in sympathy with the purpose sought to be accomplished by this bill authorizing the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks to employ landscape architects, regardless of the civil-service rules.

However, I think there should be some amendment restricting the period of time when these men so employed would be on the Government pay roll. I would suggest that the employment should be limited to not more than one year. With that, and striking out the traveling expense provisions, I have no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman propose to limit the employment to one year or the appointment to one year?

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment I have drafted provides that the employment shall in no instance be for a longer period of time than one year. I can see some merit in the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To give him the privilege of making the appointment for one year.

Mr. STAFFORD. My idea was that the director ought not to have the right to employ an expert ad infinitum, but restrict the employment to one year. He may make a subsequent employment after the 1-year period has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I should think it would be better if you limited the period of making the appointment. Otherwise he could continue making appointments after the emergency had expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. There might be an expert so highly valuable that it would be expedient to retain him for a longer time, but he should not be employed indefinitely.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Knowing the gentleman's long and valuable service as a legislator, I would like to have his opinion of the success of the civil service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on a day like to-day, with the temperature up near 100, I do not think the gentleman from New York should ask me to go into a discussion of such magnitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds heard Colonel Grant on this bill and found no objection to it. If the gentleman is going to make that amendment, I suggest that he make it two years instead of one. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is looking after the bill for the committee, but he is not here at this time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is a reasonable one, and I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] would object.

Mr. ALMON. I will say that it might be difficult for Colonel Grant, Director of Public Buildings and Grounds, to secure the services of an eminent architect for only one year. He might not be willing to come to Washington for so short an employment. For that reason, I think the gentleman had better make it two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I say to the gentleman that the Government is employing experts off the civil service register, as for instance, Maj. Hugh L. Cooper, who designed the Keokuk Dam across the Mississippi, employed by the War Department, as an expert consulting engineer in the building of Muscle Shoals, and I know the gentleman from Alabama must know of him in connection with Muscle Shoals——

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Has he not been employed by Russia also?

Mr. STAFFORD. Subsequently, yes. His work is so well recognized by reason of his work at Muscle Shoals that he has been employed elsewhere. In that instance he was employed at the rate of $50 a day. I can conceive where Colonel Grant might need the services of some scenic artist and pay him at a certain rate per day where he is giving his services, and the rate agreed upon should be applicable for a year. Then if he wishes to reemploy him again, he should have that privilege, as the amendment proposes. It is not doing violence to the original intendment of the bill. I read carefully the letter of Colonel Grant to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and I have given this bill more than passing attention.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. What is the purpose of this further than what we are having carried out right now in the city of Washington? I would like to have the gentleman explain the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman inquires as to whether we shall have a permanent civil-service employee being paid at an annual salary for continuous services, and not give to Colonel Grant this privilege, usually extended to all employers, namely, the right to obtain services of an expert for consulting purposes. This is only to authorize Colonel Grant to employ some outstanding expert to give his opinion as to some technical matter. That expert should not be employed during the entire year. He gives his expert advice and counsel to the Government as need be.

Mr. PATTERSON. And this extends a privilege to Colonel Grant which other similar employers already have now?

Mr. STAFFORD. In private employment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital be, and hereby is, authorized to employ in his discretion by contract or otherwise landscape architects, architects, engineers, artists, or other expert consultants, or firms, partnerships, or associations thereof, including the facilities, service, travel, and other expenses of their respective organizations so far as employed upon work for the said director, in accordance with the usual customs of the several professions and at the prevailing rates for such services, without reference to the civil-service requirements or to the classification act of 1923, as amended, and without regard to the restrictions of law governing the employment, salaries, or traveling expenses of regular employees of the United States; and that expenditures for such employment shall be construed to be included in any appropriation heretofore or hereafter authorized or appropriated for any work of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "employment," strike out the comma and insert the word "or," and after the word "salaries" strike out "or traveling expenses."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 7, after the word "States," insert the words "which said employment shall in no instance be for a longer period of time than one year."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] that this would not prevent the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks from employing the same expert for an additional period of one year, except that he would be required to enter into a new contract of employment after the 1-year period. My thought was that we should not delegate to the director the privilege of employing a person over a long period of years, thus binding the Government in that way, but that he should be authorized to employ him for temporary periods over 1-year periods.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This bill comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We had before us Colonel Grant, who, of course, has given very careful study to this matter. There is a large number of important park developments in the city of Washington. Gentlemen are familiar with the one down here toward the station. This work is progressing, and it is necessary for the director to have experts plan these parks, so that when completed they will harmonize with the general plan established for the public parks in Washington. As the matter stands now, if he wants to get an expert it is necessary to conduct an examination through the Civil Service Commission, and then the expert is put on the permanent roll. That means an extravagance and an expense to the Government to perform work that perhaps would require only a week or two weeks.

Mr. PATTERSON. The only difference from the present law is that this bill permits him to employ an expert without a civil-service rating.

Mr. REED of New York. Exactly, and if a professional planner is put on the regular roll, under the law he has to be kept there.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And for a period not to exceed one year. Colonel Grant wants to save money, and it strikes me that two years will bring better results than the 1-year period.

Mr. GARBER. Does not the gentleman think there should be some limitation upon the authority to employ, which reads, "to employ in his discretion, by contract or otherwise, landscape architects, architects, engineers, artists, or other consultants, or firms, partnerships, or associations thereof, including the facilities, service, travel, and other expenses, etc.," without any limitation upon the power to employ or any limitation upon the authority to fix salaries or compensation? What information has the gentleman at his disposal to give the committee in regard to the estimated cost of the authority granted in the proposed measure?

Mr. REED of New York. The only thing I know is this, that if Colonel Grant is compelled to put these experts on the permanent roll, with a civil-service status, there is no question that we shall be forcing the director to engage in a program that will be expensive.

Mr. GARBER. Do we not know that under civil service the salary or compensation is much smaller and more consistent with existing conditions than the granting of authority to go out and employ experts and architects and engineers without any limitation whatever?

Mr. REED of New York. I know the gentleman will agree with me on this, that if the gentleman were selecting an expert to do a real piece of work in his own business, he would want a real expert and not a civil-service selection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman would want a real expert. He would not want to go to the Civil Service Commission on a thing as important as the development of a city like the city of Washington. I quite agree that a limitation might be desirable were it not for the fact that I question whether any public official in connection with the Government has performed finer, more economical service for the Government than has Colonel Grant. I think we can trust him to do this work and to do it economically, and we know that he will do it well if he has an opportunity to select the very best experts to do this work.

Mr. GARBER. There is no question about Colonel Grant's authority and the thoroughness of his administration. But these experts, these engineers, these architects, and all that class of people have not conformed to existing conditions in reference to the charges that they exact from the Government, and that is the very proposition that I think we ought to guard against. We must bring the administration down to an economical basis under existing conditions.

Mr. REED of New York. I agree with the gentleman that there is always that danger; but I do believe that in this particular case, where there is not much of this work, it is a question of getting the right man for certain temporary work, and we could leave it to Colonel Grant. We ought not to put a man on the roll permanently for a temporary job.

Mr. GARBER. Did Colonel Grant give any estimate as to what the cost would be?

Mr. REED of New York. No; because most of these are rather small jobs, and that is the reason why he did not want to be forced to put men on the permanent pay roll.

Mr. GARBER. Does not the gentleman think there should be some maximum limitation upon the authority?

Mr. REED of New York. I have no quarrel with the gentleman on that point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that all debate is exhausted on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama makes a point of order that all debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, upon receiving further information, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say he is opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

Mr. REED of New York. No; I am not opposing it, except I believe it would be better if they had two years within which to clean up this work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to point out to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] gave notice that he would offer this amendment, and under that reservation no objection was made. The gentleman realizes that we are going a long way in permitting this unusual procedure in the appointment. We certainly can not establish any precedent whereby we would permit employment without a civil-service requirement. The gentleman has made a very good case for his bill, but I suggest that the gentleman accept the amendment.

Mr. REED of New York. Oh, yes. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I object to further consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's objection is too late.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the information given, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PATTERSON. Reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman going to speak about?

Mr. McGUGIN. The farm relief bill. I am quite certain the gentleman from Alabama will take no exception to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Simply to keep the record straight, I understand the bill now under consideration is the bill H. R. 10372. The Speaker had asked if there was objection to its present consideration, and I understood there was no objection, and that an amendment was offered and is now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Therefore, any objection to consideration at this point in the proceedings comes too late?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct. The bill is open for amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed the Norbeck bill for the benefit of agriculture. Mr. RAINEY, Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, has heretofore sponsored a similar bill. It is my understanding that Mr. KLEBERG, Democrat, of Texas, has heretofore sponsored a very similar bill.

This is an emergency bill, which will not only save agriculture from an immediate and complete bankruptcy but may, in turn, very well save the American Government and American civilization from the greatest crisis which has ever faced this Government or this western civilization.

There is no quick or short way out of this crisis. At this moment, optimistic as we may be, the next six months bids more fair to bring riot, bloodshed, and human suffering such as this Nation has never known than it does to bring any measurable relief or improvement from our present sad status. The only way to escape the impending danger is to be found in an immediate reduction of unemployment in American industry. Unemployment can not be corrected without markets for the products of American industry. We know that our foreign markets are gone and there is no hope of any immediate improvement in them. Everything points to a reduction of foreign markets rather than to an increase in foreign markets. Therefore any possible reduction in unemployment must be found in increased home consumption. In the matter of home markets American industry must depend upon the 27,000,000 farm people. These farm people are impoverished. They can not pay their taxes on present farm prices. There is no possible way for the American farm people to buy any of the products of industry unless there is an increase in farm prices.

The price of wheat at this time for the American farmer is, roughly, 25 cents a bushel. This Norbeck bill means that the American farmer would receive 67 cents a bushel for about 70 per cent of his wheat and 25 cents a bushel for about 30 per cent of his wheat. This means that he would receive an average of 54.4 cents a bushel for his wheat, instead of 25 cents a bushel. Agriculture can not prosper at a price of 54.4 cents a bushel for wheat; however, agriculture can pay more than twice as many debts and buy more than twice as many products of the American factories with 54 cents a bushel for wheat than it can with 25 cents a bushel. As a matter of fact, American agriculture can buy some of the products of American industry with 54 cents a bushel for wheat, while it can not buy any of the products of American industry with 25 cents a bushel. Twenty-five cents a bushel will not pay the cost of production, and there is nothing left with which to buy any of the products of the American industry.

In the case of cotton, the American farmer is receiving about 4 cents for all of his cotton. Under this bill he will receive 5 cents a pound extra for approximately half of his cotton and 4 cents for the remaining half of his cotton. This means that the American cotton planter will receive an average of about 6½ cents for his cotton, instead of 4 cents. The cotton planter is not going to make any money with 6½-cent cotton, but he can pay nearly twice as many debts and taxes with 6½-cent cotton as he could with 4-cent cotton. He can buy some of the products of American industry with some of the money received from 6½-cent cotton, whereas he can not buy any with 4-cent cotton, which will not pay the cost of production.

In the case of hogs, the American farmer is at this time receiving something like 4 cents a pound for his hogs. Under this bill he will receive 6 cents a pound for 80 per cent of his hogs and 4 cents a pound for 20 per cent of his hogs. This will mean that he will receive an average of 5.6 cents a pound for all of his hogs. He can not make any appreciable amount of money producing hogs at 5.6 cents a pound, but he can pay a lot more debts and taxes with 5.6 cents a pound for his hogs than he can with 4 cents a pound. He can produce hogs at 5.6 cents a pound and buy some of the products of American industry, but he can not buy any of the products of American industry producing hogs at 4 cents a pound and less, because that price does not pay for the cost of production.

This bill is simple of operation. No man can offer any objection to this bill unless he places his objection on the position that he does not want an increase in commodity prices. If there is not an increase in commodity prices, then, my friends, steel yourself for bankruptcy throughout the agriculture sections and for far worse in the industrial sections. In the industrial sections, the present price of farm commodities will mean not only financial bankruptcy but it is going to mean human misery, world without end, and social disorder to an extent which any intelligent and right-thinking person shudders to contemplate.

This bill has none of the objections of complexity of operation which was to be found in the equalization fee. It has none of the economic and governmental objections of taking money directly or indirectly from the public treasury as was to be found in the debenture plan. It has none of the impossibilities of operation which might lead to confusion and possible riot and disorder in the agriculture sections as is to be found in the Simpson allotment plan. It simply increases the commodity prices and places the American farmer in a position where he may be able to escape a sheriff's sale on the courthouse steps and be able to buy the products of American industry, which means the placing of some men back to work.

Give us this bill and a shorter work day, or shorter work week, or both, and we bid fair to meet this emergency of unemployment which is threatening the stability of government and foundation of American civilization. All of these relief measures based on the principle of taking money out of the public treasury are bound to fall short of their purpose, cast our Government into bankruptcy, lead further and further away from traditional America, and nearer and nearer to communistic Russia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may be allowed to proceed for three additional minutes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman make it four additional minutes, as I want to ask a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Four additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. As to the political possibilities in this bill, I am perfectly content to substitute the Rainey or Kleberg bills for the Norbeck bill, thereby taking the political credit away from a Republican and giving it to a Democrat. In times of distress such as these I am willing to submerge all partisan political advantage and follow the philosophy of the Rubaiyat and "take the cash and let the credit go." This is the opportunity of the Democrats of this House if they will prevent an adjournment until this bill is enacted into law. The other side of the situation is this: A Republican Senate has passed it and it can not die except that this Democratic House forces an adjournment, refusing to enact this bill into law. The destiny and the fate of this bill at this moment is in the hands of the Democratic majority in this House. The Democrats control the Agriculture Committee. This bill can not get out of the committee unless the Democrats bring it out. The Democrats control the Rules Committee by a majority of 8 to 4. After the Agriculture Committee reports favorably on this bill, it can not reach the floor of this House for consideration except that the Democratic Rules Committee permits it to come to the floor. The enactment of this bill and the blessings to be derived from it brings immeasurable political advantage to the Democratic Party. That is the advantage of being in control of the House of Representatives. The failure to enact this bill, denying the American people the blessings to be derived therefrom, heaps condemnation upon the Democratic Party. That is the responsibility for being in the majority control of this House of Representatives.

The army of gaunt, hungry, and suffering men to-day marching in front of the Capitol is fair warning to this Congress that it must not adjourn and run from its responsibility. I fear that it is an excuse which is forcing a premature adjournment and surrender of government in this crucial hour. The meeting of the situation which is symbolized by this army is not to be found in voting money from a Public Treasury, which is already bankrupt and is now bleeding an impoverished people. It is only to be found in getting the unemployed back to work. It will not be a full solution of this problem but it will be an immeasurable improvement if this Congress will enact this bill, which will increase the price of farm products so that the 27,000,000 farm people can buy some of the products of American industry, thereby requiring labor to manufacture these products, together with a resolution by this Congress appealing to employed labor, capital invested in American industry, and to the American people immediately to reduce the hours of labor and thereby divide available labor among more people. It will not be a great enough solution as a permanent proposition, but it bids fair to be enough to save this country from the otherwise inevitable distress, the ends and proportions of which no man knows. Let us not adjourn and surrender. Let us stay at our post and do the best that we can.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The limitations on the bill that the gentleman has discussed favorably are for three of our major farm products.

Mr. McGUGIN. Three of our major farm products.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Cotton, hogs, a by-product of corn, and wheat. Now, if the principle is fair to those three major products, why should not the principle also be applied in the line of equality in national legislation, to other major farm products, like dairy products, like wheat, like tobacco, and other products?

Mr. McGUGIN. I will say it is an emergency measure for one year.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Suppose it is. Is there any more emergency for those fellows than there is for the dairyman, the tobacco growers, or the wheat grower, or the rice grower?

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman want to ask a question for me to answer, or does he want to answer his own question?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. McGUGIN. Let me answer it. On the basis of lasting program fully respecting equality, there is but one answer to the question the gentleman presents. However, if cotton is taken care of and if wheat is taken care of you take care of the two great major farm products. If you take care of hogs it indirectly takes care of corn and other feed crops. It may not reach the dairy situation, but the outstanding purpose of this bill is to take care of those commodities that are to-day suffering, not alone by the depression in America, but because their surplus must be sold on foreign markets for cheap foreign money which is brought back home and exchanged into American money. The present disparity of foreign exchange is especially destructive of the producers of American farm products, the surplus of which is sold abroad.

I say that in this emergency any farm product which is suffering as a result of its export surplus should be in this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I must first yield to the gentleman from New York, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin if I have enough time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas have two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Who is to pay the increased cost the gentleman referred to?

Mr. McGUGIN. It comes from the processor, who in turn passes it to the consumer.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Who finally pays the extra price?

Mr. McGUGIN. The consumer. There is no question about that. There is no such thing as increasing commodity prices without someone after the producer paying the increase.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. With all the processes they have to go through, assuming the consumer did not pay, or the retailer did not refund, under the bill the United States Treasury would have to meet the deficit, would it not?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. The Treasury does not enter into this. The point is, the processor, the miller, and the packer simply pay this much more for the product than they would usually pay, and they are protected.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They give the farmer a certificate of some kind, do they not?

Mr. McGUGIN. No; that is not my understanding. The money is collected back from the processor, but it is based on the amount which is consumed in this country, and not on the surplus.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does he receive the full amount at the time he delivers his wheat or his hogs?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. He receives it ultimately from the processor, and the processor passes it on.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How does he receive it back when wheat is selling for 25 cents? He will receive 25 cents a bushel at the time he delivers the wheat and will also receive a certificate.

Mr. McGUGIN. In the case of wheat he will receive 25 cents a bushel and in addition will receive 42 cents on the per cent of the wheat consumed in America. He will probably receive this additional 42 cents at some time in the future.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When will he receive the additional amount?

Mr. LAMNECK. As soon as he cashes his certificates.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas have two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman spoke about some of these farm products being crucified. I may state that if the gentleman will look into the facts he will see that the farm products corn and barley have been crucified on the prohibition cross. If he would turn to the repeal of prohibition for relief for the farmer, instead of following the Anti-Saloon League, he would get somewhere.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am glad to have this enlightening information from the gentleman from Wisconsin, but I am afraid we can not wait for relief until the far-off time when the eighteenth amendment is repealed.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think there is a general misunderstanding as to what the farmer is to get. The farmer would receive only a certificate based on the ratio between wheat sold for domestic consumption and wheat exported?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. And the certificate would not be payable out of the Treasury in any event until the Treasury had collected the money from the processor?

Mr. McGUGIN. Not one penny.

Mr. BURTNESS. And it would be prorated back?

Mr. McGUGIN. It does not come out of the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman is in error. The certificate is payable within 30 days; but if there is nothing in the fund, he is not going to be paid.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and also to insert in my remarks a short letter I have written to various clubs and organizations upon money management and individual budgeting; also a speech I delivered before the New England Education Association at Atlantic City.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my remarks are not upon a Republican or Democratic subject but upon a subject which is nonpartisan and which is vital to us at this time of the reconstruction period in our own financial and national economic matters. We are trying to cure our economic illness. In curing it we must find the causes for it, eradicate them, and prevent the germs from attacking again. It is, however, generally agreed that unwise distribution of money is one of the causes of the financial malady.

This person and that person, this group and that group, are blamed for the present upset business conditions; but if we are honest, we must admit that we the citizens of the United States, to a great extent, have only ourselves to blame.

Members of Congress receive day after day letters from all over the country asking us to balance the Budget. As they come in we wonder how many of these people try to, or know how to, balance their own budgets. We wonder how many of these people know how to manage in any degree their own money. They write us to balance the Budget, and in the next sentence ask us to make some huge governmental expenditure.

In order to do away with economic illiteracy, we must face the facts. Most of us are economically illiterate. I have been working for months trying to start the people of the country upon an individual budgeting movement. I want the people to become budget conscious—budget conscientious.

Hundreds have said to me: "If I had only managed my money, if I had only budgeted, I would have something to-day, now that I am out of employment, and I should know that I would have a roof over my head and enough to eat and enough to wear." We are now paying the price, both individually and nationally, of our economic illiteracy.

I believe these men who are here from all over the country who are asking for a bonus would much rather have jobs so that they could give their families food and clothing, and then the bonus would be insurance for themselves and their families when they are older or for their families if they should die before the bonus matured. I have so much sympathy with them. Perhaps if some of them had understood budgeting, in common with thousands of us, they would be able to get along at the present time. It is obvious there is something wrong with our economic structure. We must see that our financial building in the future is on a firm foundation.

We have half forgotten the value of the penny. Even the children do not know the value of a penny to-day. They think nothing of a penny or of a few pennies. When you were children, and when I was a child, we valued pennies; we counted our pennies. Let us make all the people of America count their pennies and distribute them wisely. Let us help them start upon a simple budgeting plan.

The National Retail Credit Association has indorsed the Florence Barnard plan of budgeting or money management, about which I spoke to them at their national convention in Washington a few weeks ago. They realize that if people managed their money properly, balanced their own budgets every month, they are much more likely to pay their bills. They are much better credit risks—and it will help the purchasers, for they can secure credit much more readily.

The letters we receive from people who balance their own budgets show very plainly they understand what it means for us to try to balance the National Budget. They are usually constructive. My colleagues, you have many friends. You can do much when you go back to your districts to get this country started on a stable financial basis if you will only help in this movement. It is just as great a patriotic duty as buying Liberty bonds in the World War. It requires no legislation. It requires only concerted action. Every school in the land ought to teach its children the value of the pennies, how to make them count that they may know the value of a dollar. We owe it to our children and our children's children to give them a chance to learn money management. As one educator has said, "Time and money management should have been taught from the very beginning of education." Unfortunately, as far as I can learn, there is only one place in America where money management is being taught throughout the school system. During the past four years the Florence Barnard plan of money management has been conducted with marked success in the schools of Brookline, Mass. It is so simple a child can understand it, yet it is suitable for the adult. At the present time children are taught how to make money, but they are taught very little about what to do with that money after they get it. This is unfair.

Children taught to budget in their youth will budget automatically when they grow up. Remember also that there is a definite relation between budgetary planning for individual citizens and budgetary planning for the town, the city, the State, and for the Nation. Public officials who balance their own budget will be loath to squander the taxpayer's money, and the taxpayer who balances his own budget will not tolerate profligate spending by public officials.

Can you not understand what it would mean if we, the adults, managed our own incomes wisely, no matter how small they are. We would then know the value of the dollar. We could then get the most for our money. Laying aside every month a certain amount for our necessities, a certain amount for giving, a certain amount for amusement, a certain amount for insurance, and a certain amount for savings banks and investments will provide security and a feeling of stability.

I have sent the following letter to numerous clubs and organizations and much interest has been expressed in a national budgeting drive:

MY DEAR ——— ———: No one really knows the cause of the present business depression, but everyone realizes that most Americans have been living far beyond their means. Many of us are economically illiterate. Comparatively few understand money management. Few understand the value of a budget, which, of course, means living within one's income and distributing one's resources proportionately. Hundreds of people to-day are saying, "If I had only been taught how to manage my money." If everyone had to know how to budget, the country would not now be paying the price.

That the Nation may learn as soon as possible how to manage money, and to the end that this country may never be in such a sad plight, a national economic education movement is essential. It is insurance against depression. I have already asked the aid of the Federal Government to have money management taught in the schools of the Nation. Children taught budgeting in their youth, will budget automatically when they grow up. As one educator has said, "Time and money management should have been taught from the very beginning of education."

I have asked the Secretary of the Interior to urge the introduction of money management in every school in the land. I have suggested that the Florence Barnard money-management plan be employed, as it seems to be the simplest and best. It is so simple a child can understand it, and it is suitable for adults. It teaches the value of a dollar as well as the value of a penny. The same general principles that can be given the distribution of 10 cents are applicable to the distribution of $10,000. For four years this plan has been developed in the schools of Brookline, Mass., with marked success.

I have also asked the aid of the Federal Government in a nation-wide campaign to make the adults budget-minded. At this time old and young should go hand in hand and learn together, and there is no surer way of reaching the parents than through their children.

I am appealing both to men's and women's organizations. The American husband is very generous. He allows the wife to spend the money in the family pocketbook. He has faith in his wife. Does she always justify that faith? It has been claimed that the extravagance of women is one of the causes for the depression. No woman will let that statement go unchallenged.

Wise spending, wise saving, and wise giving affect health, morals, happiness. They make character and develop spiritual growth. They mean self-preservation for the individual and salvation for the Nation.

Individual budgeting is an incentive to do the best one can with one's resources instead of trying to keep up with one's neighbor. It develops self-respect. It would bring about a more even distribution of money and thereby aid every industry, every bank, every insurance company, every church, and every charity. It would bring about wiser and better legislation. The Federal Government is expected to balance the Budget. Why should not the individual balance his budget?

Your organization is powerful. Will you help save the Nation's financial structure? In the war period people sold Liberty bonds. Will not your members, as a patriotic duty, volunteer to teach economy in the real sense of the word?

The women of America played a vital part in the World War. The country needs your splendid, unselfish war-time spirit again.

With kindest regards.

Yours very sincerely,

MRS. JOHN JACOB ROGERS.

This individual budget movement would give a feeling of security; already has the indorsement, also, of a great many of the different banks, a great many of the different insurance companies, and the churches. One church plans to have this system introduced into every one of its mission schools. It has the indorsement of better-business organizations and of different clubs. You can see why the industries and the stores are interested in this movement as well as the charitable organizations, because an intelligent, proportionate distribution of money will assist everybody. It will help turn the wheels of industry again. It will provide employment. [Applause.]

THE MOST FOR YOUR MONEY

(Speech delivered June 28 to the National Education Association at Atlantic City by EDITH NOURSE ROGERS)

One of the most glaring causes for the existing upset business conditions is the woeful lack of protection of the dollar by the individual. Probably one reason for this is the fact that the United States was enjoying such great prosperity. The people felt that even greater prosperity was just around the corner and why worry about budgeting or careful management of their money which would safeguard them in case of smaller income or no work. Why worry about charging everything at the shops regardless of whether they could pay the bills, when undoubtedly they could either make higher wages or obtain money in speculation? The crash of values came with its day of reckoning and to-day people are wondering how they can avoid the pitfalls of the past and start on the upgrade of a real and stable prosperity.

The present financial breakdown is a stoplight in the highway of national bankruptcy. For passing a red light in the lane to prosperity we always pay. Thousands of American citizens would have been able to tide over the crisis in comfort if they had spent their inflated wage earnings in accordance with sound principles. But many are much more badly frightened than hurt and nothing will steady them more than taking stock of their resources and planning how they can best distribute them.

If out of the present economic crisis we can find ways and means to improve existing conditions and to avoid their recurrence, the experience nationally and individually will not have been in vain.

The letters which we, as Members of Congress, have been receiving from all over the country certainly point to at least one definite need; that is, economic education which shall develop a clear understanding of the few simple principles upon which successful money management is based. Every individual who possesses clear ideas about living within income and proportionate distribution of income is fitted to apply these principles to the use of family as well as personal income, or to the disbursement of public revenues. Personal budgeting of expenditures should be practiced from the earliest years. The schools of our country should give everyone an opportunity to develop a scientific and practical method of budget making. Let the schools make our children budget conscious and budget conscientious.

Up to the present time systematic training in the management of money has not been included in school or college curricula to any great extent. One place in the country, however, has been conducting a pioneer experiment under the direction of Miss Florence Barnard in economic education (time and money management) throughout its public-school system during the past four years. Under competent leadership, and with the cooperation of able and progressive-minded teachers, the results so far attained have proved that effective work in this field is not only possible but eminently practical. I find that educators and economists of national repute, who have been watching this Brookline, Mass., experiment with keenest interest, are unanimous in their favorable comments about the plan used there. It is so simple a child can understand it, and yet suitable for adults. I quote the words of one who said in a personal letter to me, "I consider it the most comprehensive and practical plan of which I have learned."

Among the features that characterize this work in the schools in Brookline are the following:

(1) Money management, which involves arithmetic, thrift, safety, and citizenship training, is being closely connected with character development from the kindergarten through high school. Money management, in other words, is being used as a guide to and test of life management.

(2) Pupils are being taught the principles underlying safe investment and how to raise the standard of living on the income that each one has. In this way they are being steered away from aiming for standards beyond their means.

(3) The budgeting habit among both boys and girls is being cultivated as early as the fifth grade, and they are being led onward into adult budgeting logically and naturally.

After four years of this program of instruction beneficial results are accruing to the pupils of the public schools of Brookline. They are learning:

(1) That there are a few very simple principles that underlie all successful money management.

(2) That by distributing allowances or income proportionately they can save more, give more, and have more.

(3) That it is easily possible to control money, and by so doing oftentimes control circumstances.

(4) That it is not the amount of income so much as the management of it that leads to happy, successful living.

The budgeting habit obviously lays foundations for accurate accounting and bookkeeping in business and commercial life and is a contribution to successful home making. It is known through judges and court records divorce in many cases can be traced to money considerations or mismanagement. Budget-mindedness leads to stability. Such a habit fosters self-control and leads to self-respecting financial independence. It is directly preventive of poverty and crime. Not only is physical health in many ways dependent upon the wise use of money, but the mental, moral, and spiritual effects of sane thinking about money matters can not be questioned.

Our Nation is entering upon a new phase of its economic existence. The easy road to wealth through the exploitation of extensive natural resources has been blocked. There is no more land to acquire for an insignificant sum. Our free forests are owned. Our mineral wealth has been tapped. From now on our economic progress must be attained through the development of personal skill and ability to render needed service. The first requisite to success in this new era will be the conservation of monetary rewards for this service. While increasing the capacity of youth to earn through the development of increased vocational skill, the schools must develop a respect for the income earned through this increased capacity to serve. They should teach children that it is just as patriotic to protect the American dollar as it was to buy Liberty bonds during the World War. The efforts of the schools should be supplemented by a nation-wide movement at this time to enlist all adults in the effort to stabilize values. At this time old and young should go hand in hand and learn together, and there is no surer way of reaching the parents than through their children.

I believe it is our patriotic duty to help in such a way under present conditions no less than it was our duty to raise funds through Liberty bonds to finance the war. We are face to face with our own economic illiteracy, and the responsibility of correcting this condition rests entirely with us, the citizens of our country. The time for action is here and now. Delay means continuance of the economic illiteracy which is responsible for very many of the evils of our times.

The thousands of bonus marchers now encamped in Washington give testimony that there is something radically wrong in our economic structure. If these men had jobs they would prefer them to a bonus from the Government. Jobs would mean money for daily living and the bonus insurance for the future of themselves and family. If these men knew money management they would be much more apt to realize just why the payment out of the Treasury of such a huge sum to help only one group of citizens would further stagnate business and make jobs they would like to have an impossibility for themselves and for thousands of others out of work. The pathos of their plight makes me all the more anxious to secure stable economic readjustments. Their behavior in Washington proves again what fine Americans they are.

The average American upholds a high standard of honesty in business and a commendable respect for ownership of property and money, but there are thousands of people who assume financial obligations which common sense should tell them they can never fulfill. Under the pressure of high-powered salesmanship the citizen with low resistance to temptation yields to his inclination to outdo the Jones and his other neighbors in possessions until his financial status is hopeless.

The rapid rate of economic progress in this country has earned the applause of the whole world. American citizens are very proud of their wealth and business power. That all good things might be "bigger and better" is a well-known American ideal. However, the very spirit that prompts us to strike for distinction in the grandeur of material things in this country is now a cause of much tribulation. We are paying dearly for our too pretentious ambitions. We have trained ourselves to acquire wealth rapidly, but have often allowed ourselves to expend it foolishly.

Remember also that there is a definite relation between budgetary planning for individual citizens and budgetary planning for the Nation. Individuals who have learned to save money for themselves will be slow to countenance profligate spending by public officials. Members of Congress are now flooded with letters from their constituents urging the appropriation of huge sums for every conceivable purpose. Some of these purposes are selfish. Many of them are sincerely planned to aid the Nation in this emergency. Most of them are unwise. If we have not the money, it can not be spent for any purpose. The relation of the individual budget to the National Budget will be realized as we begin to pay the taxes which it has been necessary to levy to defray our national debts. The French have more nearly returned to normal conditions than the people of any other country. They have been able to do so because they realized the value of the sou.

With the same end in view, let us bring the penny back into the esteem and respect of the American people.

If America is to return to a period of material prosperity, it will be only through the efforts of its citizens, individually and collectively, to guide their spending wisely. There is a great opportunity for tremendous public service knocking at the door of the educators. Getting the most for our money not only in material but in spiritual values rests in large part with them. Their teaching makes good citizens or bad citizens. Truly their responsibility is great. Truly the future of America is in their hands.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE ACT TO PROMOTE THE MINING OF COAL, PHOSPHATE, ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 4509, to further amend the act approved February 25, 1920, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Perhaps the gentleman is not fully informed as to the purpose of this bill. It came to the Public Lands Committee——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I am that much informed that I know the committee did not follow the recommendation of the department and in its present form the bill is objectionable for that reason.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If the gentleman will read the bill before him he will find it is not in the exact language concurred in by both the Department of the Interior and the Navy Department. I would suggest that if we wanted the bill best to conform we should strike out, in line 6, on page 2, the words "nothing in," but as the bill is drawn it takes care of the situation.

Since before 1929 the Department of the Interior has been trying to stop the production of oil not merely upon its own leases but throughout the United States. In the interest of conservation a scheme was started to have the owners of all oil lands—private oil lands, and Government oil lands in different oil pools—agree upon the amount of production. In connection with permits upon which oil was discovered and for which leases were allowable under the law, requirements have been made that the lease being issued, production should not be made under the lease for 1 year, 2 years, or 3 years; and as each of those periods has matured, the time has been further postponed by the Department of the Interior.

Under the terms of the leases it is required that during the period of nonproduction certain rentals shall be paid; and whether there has or has not been production, there is no provision permitting the whole term of the lease to be extended into the future. That has been fair and it has been recognized as fair, and finally the department sent up a recommendation that during the time of the lease, where the department, in the interest of conservation, has postponed the production of oil, the time of the lease should be extended and that the rentals during that period should be waived.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In its letter the department says the rentals should not be suspended, because that is not the method followed in commercial leases. This bill does not follow the recommendations of the department.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. It is practically in the language furnished by the department. The bill reads:

> In the event the Secretary of the Interior, in the interest of conservation, shall direct or shall assent to the suspension of operations—

You will notice it is when the Secretary of the Interior, in the interest of conservation, has ordered or shall assent to suspend operations, then the payment of acreage rentals shall be suspended during that period and the term extended. The point which has been at issue between the Interior and Navy Departments is whether this permission should be extended to the Navy leases. In my personal opinion, it should be, but the Navy Department's last recommendation was that they had not yet so decided, and therefore the Navy leases are excluded. However, I venture to say that in the next Congress the Navy Department will return with the recommendation that there be added to this very bill a provision just as it is here to cover oil wells on naval reserves. If my personal view, and I think the view of a number of members of the Public Lands Committee, were to be adopted, in line 6, on page 2, the words "nothing in" would be stricken out, so that the proviso would read:

> That this act shall be construed as affecting existing leases within the borders of the naval petroleum reserves and naval oil-shale reserves.

If the gentleman is going to take the report of the Secretary of the Navy, he should not object to this bill, because this bill refers only to those lands that are not in the Navy leases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does this refer to Navy leases?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. This absolutely excludes all the Navy leases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where have we heard that before?

Mr. COLTON. If the gentleman will permit, I feel sure that the Public Lands Committee followed the recommendations of the Interior Department, and they have control of the only lands that are affected. The Navy lands are expressly excluded.

Mr. STAFFORD. You do not follow the language proposed by the Department of the Interior as recommended by the Commissioner of Public Lands.

Mr. COLTON. I understand the substance of their recommendation is embodied in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office say that the rentals should continue but that they should be credited when royalties later develop, and that is not this bill. You are suspending the rentals, and that is not the practice with respect to commercial leases.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Let me explain to the gentleman that it is almost a case of tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not in the opinion of the department.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes; in the opinion of the department, too.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not according to the report.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. No; it is not written in the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; that is in the report.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman listen to me a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. When the time of the lease is extended into the future and the time or the requirements for payment of rentals when nonproduction occurs are extended during the same period, you just push the whole lease along, day for day and year for year, and you cover exactly the same contract during the exact term with a later maturity date.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the department is opposed to that very policy.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. All right; now listen to the second proposition. If this amount of rental is to be deducted from the royalties, the quantity of money which the Government receives is just that much less in dollars and cents, and as the bill was amended in the Senate it pays a little more——

Mr. STAFFORD. But the money is in the lessee's pocket and not in the Government's pocket. That is the difference.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. No. He is out all the personal cost to him of postponed operation, closed-down and shut-in wells——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to point out that the oil interests are very peculiar and inconsistent in looking after any constructive conservation plan. Not until the oil people honestly get together and agree on a comprehensive national conservation plan can any group or local interest expect any relief from Congress. Only yesterday we had a comprehensive plan here which would look forward to the production needs and give power in the States to control production, and there were several Representatives here on their toes ready to object because it just did not meet their local interests, and I say, in all kindliness to my friend from Colorado, and I say this in a spirit of friendliness, you can not cure your oil situation with popgun bills of this kind. You must get together and agree on some comprehensive plan of conservation and control of production.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. I entirely agree with the gentleman in regard to a revision of the laws in reference to oil mining, and especially in reference to oil for conservation purposes, but, certainly, the gentleman would not resort to the Consent Calendar for the enactment of general legislation of this kind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course not. I agree with the gentleman. The gentleman wants to be fair, I am sure. When I made reference to the bill that was called yesterday, I had in mind that that bill is not one that we can brush aside. I think there is something in it that deserves careful consideration.

Mr. GARBER. I think that is true, and I think there is a great deal of merit in what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And in the same spirit, what you may call a popgun bill is a separate detail of the whole picture, and, surely, the gentleman is not going to say that where he and four or five others have a lease on which $1,920 is due every 12 months and the Government says he shall postpone production, why should we not give legislative aid to postpone the payment of that rental into the future, and to increase the number of years of time for which the postponement is required by the Government? That is the legislative authority that is asked here by the department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I saw that where the Government is the lessor and by its order prevents drilling for oil or the obtaining of oil from such a lease, naturally, with that order, the payment should be deferred.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. That is what this proposed statute seeks to do. It authorizes the Department of the Interior, when it issues its order requiring the stopping of such work, to postpone the collection of the rental.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am only seeking to impress upon the gentleman the necessity of very serious legislative study of the whole question of oil production. I am doing nothing else. I am not objecting to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 4574, to extend the provisions of the national bank act to the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am rather sympathetic toward this bill; in fact, I can see the urgent need for the enactment of its provisions, but I had some doubt in reaching a conclusion as to why the existing bank should decide to go out of business when there is need for such banking facilities.

Mr. STEAGALL. They are going out of business and taking the preliminary steps for liquidation. They will be without commercial banking facilities unless this legislation is passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill recognizes the principle of branch banking.

Mr. STEAGALL. We amended the bill by striking out the provision which authorizes branch banking.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not have the bill as reported by the House committee. I had the bill as passed by the Senate. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the national bank act, as amended, and all other acts of Congress relating to national banks, shall, in so far as not locally inapplicable hereafter, apply to the Virgin Islands of the United States: Provided, That (1) any bank which shall organize under the authority of this act may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, establish or acquire and keep in operation not more than two branches in the Virgin Islands of the United States; (2) said bank and its branches shall have the right to act as broker or agent for others as granted by the act of September 7, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 752; U. S. C., title 12, ch. 2, sec. 92), notwithstanding that the population of the place in which it is located may exceed 5,000; (3) the Comptroller of the Currency shall assess and said bank shall pay the expense of examinations of said bank and its branches.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the words "United States" on page 1, line 6. Strike out the colon after "United States" in line 6 and insert a period.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ALMON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to give notice that until the Consent Calendar is completed I shall object in the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman from Alabama is not going to jeopardize his own bill.

Mr. ALMON. I will say this: That we have set aside this time for considering the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There are bills on it that ought to be passed before Congress adjourns. If we are going to have all debate taken up in political speeches and speeches out of order, we can not finish the work. I want to discourage, as far as I can, speeches of that character.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better cultivate a little charity and kindness in his heart if he wants to get to heaven. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALMON. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, in this case; but I shall object in the future.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I want to devote a few minutes to an agricultural discussion. Modern agriculture, as I conceive it, begins with Abraham Lincoln, in the establishment of the Department of Agriculture while he was President, and in the disposition of millions of acres of land out in the West through the Hatch Acts, the proceeds of which went for the benefit of land-grant colleges all throughout the United States, that have served wonderfully the special purpose of developing the picture of national agriculture. During one spasm of agricultural relief here we had the "equalization fee" presented. I always held that to be fundamentally un-American, because compulsion, and not voluntary effort, was its motive. Then along came the "debenture plan," which proposed to exchange a piece of paper —Uncle Sam's I O U—for the exporter of agricultural products that were going abroad. The producer would have to dispose of this piece of paper to some importer. That, in the long run, would result, not in the farmer or the producer getting equality—and that is all agriculture is entitled to—but the farmer was being placed in a position where he had to trade this debenture to an importer of something to pay import duties, and the result would be that the importers would get together and you could not resolve back to the producer himself the benefit that we were trying to legislate for him.

Then we have had another school of thought that said that after all in its final analysis agriculture is entitled to equality, and how are we going to give it to agriculture? We sought to evolve the great "cooperative philosophy" and policy into a law, i. e., self-help was its motive. Get into the cooperative of the commodity you produce and help battle for fair prices. We set up the Farm Board, and we hoped that the Farm Board would help bring this equality to agriculture; but what do we find under the operations of the Farm Board, with a lot of people who claim to have the interests of agriculture at heart, but this. They allowed to be set up a series of "stabilization corporations," paying unconscionable salaries, and helping to destroy or make impossible the very agency of the Government that was established for bringing equality to agriculture through the cooperative movement.

What have we right here now before us? We have the Norbeck bill, that went through the Senate yesterday without even a discussion, passed unanimously, nobody giving any serious consideration to it at all. I suppose it was through some act of courtesy or Christian charity toward some one over there.

What does that seek to do? That seeks to bring equality to all agricultural products upon the basis of a tariff for only three products, and what are they? In the first place, there is cotton; in the second place, hogs; and why do they take hogs instead of corn, because after all the major portion of corn goes into the production of hogs? Three, they take wheat. If there is any fairness in the proposition, if it is fundamentally sound, it should be universally applied in this country of ours to all the products of agriculture. I claim there is no more right for selecting corn or hogs or cotton or wheat than there is for dairy products, for tobacco, for rice, or other of the major products.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Is it not a fact that if we could stabilize and bring these three products, which are 75 per cent of the total crop, up to a price where the farmer could afford to raise them, it would bring up the price of all the other commodities?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It would be helpful, but the moment you go along with political promises of what you are going to do for the farmer to-morrow, you and I know that we would be handing out just simply a lot of bunk for political expediency. Let us apply it to every farm product or give it to none.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I am for this bill, because I believe it is the one thing that will bring back prosperity to this country. You have to do something to bring the farmer back or you will never get prosperity in the country. I believe this bill will be helpful. It is only for one year, and if we could establish it for one year and bring the farmer back and start the wheels of progress in this country, then the other portions of the country that are agricultural would get the benefit of it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. If the principle is fair for the three products that you have cited, it is fair to apply it to every product of the farm, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I agree with you on that.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Then why not go the full road?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Because if you do, you will destroy the object that it is put in for—that is, merely to take the three basic products of agriculture—and when they are established and when the price is raised on them it would raise the price of everything else on the farm.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I am surprised at the lack of information the gentleman is displaying on this program. The gentleman does not seem to realize that after all neither hogs nor cotton nor wheat nor corn constitutes the major product.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. What is the major product?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Dairy products.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does the gentleman believe the Government should guarantee prices?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. No.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Any more for the farmers than for industry?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. No; and what will happen if this bill becomes a law? You will soak the consumers in the first place $1,000,000,000 at least. You will put it on the backs of the consumers. Where is the purchasing power coming from for the millions of people who are out of employment, if they have not the money with which to buy any thing, if you go to work and boost the price to them?

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman really think that an increase in the price of wheat by 42 cents a bushel would increase the price of a loaf of bread to the consumer?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. No. Anyone who knows the story of the increase in the price of wheat knows that 42 cents or 60 cents or 84 cents does not increase the price of bread 1 cent a loaf, but it will be taken advantage of, make no mistake about that.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman think that an increase in the price of hogs 2 cents a pound would increase the price of pork on the block?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes; I do. By the way, let me give the gentleman from Kansas a little education right here. The gentleman talks quite a little around and about the bill he was supposed to be discussing, but, after all, it is hogs and not corn that is in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes. The gentleman is making the best speech on agriculture that I have ever heard in this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman think an increase in the price of cotton of 5 cents a pound on one-half the crop would increase the cost of clothing which the people would wear?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It would certainly increase the price some. Everybody knows, because every time we put a little added cost upon what is bought, the manufacturer of that product is not alone going to pass on the added cost, but he is going to add to it for his own protection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have been listening to the gentleman with a great deal of interest because this matter was discussed in my presence yesterday. I understand the gentleman is complaining about the action of the Republican-controlled Senate yesterday in taking precipitate or ill-considered action in passing this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I will go farther than that, even if it is a Republican body, or they allege it is. There are many of them over there under disguise, as the gentleman and I both know.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman conceive this to be a tariff bill or a bill to raise revenue?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Well, it is a great deal like a 3-headed calf bill that was over before the Committee on Agriculture one time. We were not quite certain of the parentage, and when we got down to the final analysis even the fellow from Texas that got his 3-headed calf bill out of our committee would not admit he was the father of the legislation. He wanted to withdraw the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Irrespective of the merits of it, a serious question has arisen whether the Senate could originate this type of legislation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I personally have very serious doubts as to the constitutionality of the Norbeck bill, but many things move over there in that strange, mysterious body that it is hard to account for.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. In final analysis, is this not a "price-pegging" project? It is to protect prices?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Well, I think that is a gambling term, and I am entirely unfamiliar with gambling terms. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I thought the gentleman's education was more complete.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. This bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall, within 15 days after it becomes law, make an estimate of the percentage of domestic production of the products mentioned that is needed for domestic consumption.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. Suppose his estimate is grossly inaccurate, and he estimates that it will take a great deal more for domestic consumption than is really needed, where will that leave the processors, who have had to pay 42 cents a bushel for wheat more than the domestic market and who have that surplus on their hands?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Well, they are hung up. In the first place, they have this money invested and there is no way for them to get protection. In the final analysis, Uncle Sam, the United States Treasury itself, is going to find itself seven hundred and fifty million or a billion dollars out of pocket. The taxpayers coughing up more money and cursing their Government. Again, Government estimates are often far amiss.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. Somebody has said it would not cost the Government anything, but there is a provision on page 10 of the bill which provides that the adjusted certificates issued as the bill provides shall be direct obligations of the Government.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. Is there any consistency between that provision and the statement that the Government is not liable?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Oh, the Government in the last analysis is going to be soaked, and everybody knows it.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman is not ashamed of what he is saying to his colleagues on the Republican side, some of us over here would like to hear it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I am more ashamed of my company now than I was. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE FAILURE OF FARM LEGISLATION

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of the Northwest will be interested in having a little inside information as to the reason for the failure of farm legislation in the first session of the Seventy-second Congress. It is very illuminating when all facts are considered and analyzed, and obviously traditional when we realize that the House of Representatives and its committees are under the control of the Democratic Party.

When I was first elected to the House of Representatives from Minnesota in 1924, I sought and secured a place on the major Committee on Agriculture. I felt that by serving on this important committee I could serve all people of my great State to the best advantage, as Minnesota is one of the greatest agricultural States in the Union. This committee has charge of all legislation relating to agriculture in every form, conservation of forests and wild life, as well as legislation affecting packing plants, stockyards, grain exchanges, and flour mills.

Minnesota ranks first in the production of butter, first in the production of flour, near the top in the production and marketing of livestock and poultry, while last year we only produced 13,000,000 bushels of wheat. The small grains and corn raised in Minnesota are principally used for feed, for dairy and beef cattle, hogs, and poultry.

When I took my seat on the Committee on Agriculture the Republican Party was in control of the House of Representatives. It remained in control until the 7th day of December, 1931, at which time the Democratic Party secured control by a small majority. They not only secured control of the House organization but also took control over all committees in Congress.

During my nearly eight years of service as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, seven years of which was under the leadership of that venerable farm leader and Republican, Hon. GILBERT HAUGEN, from Iowa, real consideration was given by our committee to farm legislation advocated by the farmers of this country and their duly constituted representatives. Upon two occasions we secured the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill, which was twice vetoed by President Coolidge; the passage of the 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine and other legislation to protect the dairy industry; the passage of adequate tariffs to protect dairy products and livestock, including butter at a rate of 14 cents per pound, as well as many other important measures advocated by farm organizations and leaders.

It will be of interest to the dairy farmers of the country to note that the last Democratic tariff act, which was repealed in 1921, provided a duty for butter of 2½ cents per pound, which permitted millions of pounds of cheaply made foreign butter to be imported into this country in direct competition with butter domestically produced, while the present Republican tariff law has a duty of 14 cents per pound on butter, and gives real protection to the dairy farmers. If it were not for this tariff on butter at the present time, millions of pounds of foreign butter would flood our markets, due to the depreciation in foreign currency, and the dairy farmers of the United States would probably not receive more than 8 cents per pound for butterfat instead of the prevailing price.

The Democratic Party has not changed its traditional free-trade policy, as has been so clearly demonstrated in their platform recently adopted at the Chicago convention, when they state that they believe in tariffs for revenue only. They also praise the administration of Woodrow Wilson, and it is, therefore, reasonable to assume that if the Democratic Party again secures control of the Government they will reduce the duty on butter to 2½ cents per pound and place the majority of products raised in the Northwestern States upon the free list, thereby causing an influx of imported agricultural products, to further destroy the markets and price of dairy and other farm products produced by our farmers.

The farmers of the Northwest, regardless of party affiliation, are protectionists. They never have and never will subscribe to the free-trade or tariff-for-revenue only doctrines of the Democratic Party. Even though the prices on agricultural products have dropped off to levels far below the cost of production, these farmers are not willing to take a chance to jump from the frying pan into a Democratic fire of free trade, because they know from recent experience that if they do so they will be subjected to the most strenuous kind of foreign competition on everything which they produce, and they have no desire to give the domestic market, as poor as it is, over to their foreign competitor.

While I am on the subject of tariffs let me call your attention to the Democratic tariff bill which was passed by the House over the protest of all Republicans. This bill provides that the President shall call an international conference for the purpose of adjusting tariff rates. Fortunately, the bill will never become a law, as we still have a Republican Senate and a Republican President. Can you imagine what would happen if we would let a majority of the European countries sit down at a conference to adjust our tariff rates when they are all particularly anxious to sell their farm and manufactured products in this country? Surely the answer is obvious. They would join hands with the Democratic Party and the floodgates would be opened for unlimited importation of foreign goods to cause further distress for labor, industry, and agriculture.

On March 27 of this year I addressed the House on the subject of emergency farm legislation. At that time I stressed the fact that nearly 55,000,000 people in the United States were dependent directly and indirectly upon farming. I felt then as I do now that permanent prosperity will never be restored in the United States until such time as the farmers shall receive cost of production plus a fair profit for the products of the soil.

I urged the passage of emergency legislation which would give the farmers a minimum price of $1.25 a bushel for wheat, 15 cents a pound for cotton, 75 cents a bushel for corn, 70 cents a bushel for rye, 65 cents a bushel for barley, 10 cents a pound for hogs and cattle, and 32 cents a pound for butter. Since the introduction of my bill I have received hundreds of letters from all parts of the United States advocating its passage as the only sensible legislation of an emergency character which will bring the country out of its economic depression.

A large number of similar bills have been introduced in Congress since my bill was first presented and a nationwide interest has been developed for the consideration of this character of legislation as an emergency means for the restoration of normal conditions.

We have had a splendid demonstration within the past six weeks of the economic effect on the country due to the advance in the price on hogs. During the latter part of May, hogs were selling at $2.50 a hundred. A gradual advance in price has been had since that time, and to-day hogs are selling at Chicago around $5 a hundred as the top price. The effect of this increase on one agricultural product has tended to restore confidence, has given encouragement to the farmers of the country, and has been the first stabilizing factor for an increase in commodity price levels developing within the past two years.

I am more firmly convinced than ever that prices on agricultural products must first advance before we again start on the upward grade.

With the purchasing power of nearly 55,000,000 people dependent upon agriculture restored to a reasonable level, it will not take long for the restoration of our industrial and manufacturing institutions with a consequent relief for unemployment. Agriculture is the very base of economic prosperity in this country, and all groups should join together, both in and out of public life, to revive agriculture—the greatest industry in this country.

When representatives of the American Farm Bureau, the National Grange, and the Farmers Union, the three large farm organizations of the country, appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and advocated the passage of their plan for permanent farm relief, sympathetic consideration was given to their program. They urged the passage of a bill which provided for the equalization fee, originally contained in the old McNary-Haugen bill, the debenture, and the allotment plan. This farm bill was favorably reported by the committee, and our chairman was instructed to appear before the Rules Committee to secure a rule which would permit consideration of the bill by the House of Representatives. The Rules Committee is controlled by the Democratic Party and has a membership of eight Democrats and four Republicans. The Rules Committee refused to permit consideration of the farmer's program and consequently they have blocked this measure in the House of Representatives.

After the Democrats succeeded in blocking this bill, our committee proceeded to the consideration of emergency legislation, which had for its purpose the raising of the price on certain agricultural commodities so that the farmers would receive the world price, plus the tariff on the commodities included in the bill. Congressman KLEBERG, of Texas, and Congressman RAINEY, of Illinois, introduced bills which provided for the payment to the cotton farmers of 5 cents a pound additional for cotton consumed in this country, 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and 2 cents a pound on hogs. Nearly 60 per cent of the production of wheat in the United States is in the Southern States and consequently the bill was distinctly a southern bill.

When this bill was considered for amendments by our committee, I successfully secured the adoption of an amendment which would pay the dairy farmers 14 cents a pound additional for butterfat and 6 cents a pound on livestock. As soon as this amendment was adopted a majority of the Democratic members of the committee lost interest in the measure, and I am firmly convinced that they have no interest whatsoever in the dairy farmers of the Northwest. The emergency bill was finally reported out of the committee by a vote of 10 to 11 with instructions to the chairman to appear before the Rules Committee for a rule so that consideration could be given to this emergency legislation by the House of Representatives. The Rules Committee again refused to permit the consideration of the bill, and consequently this measure was again lost to the American farmers.

On July 14 the Norbeck bill was passed in the Senate. This bill was somewhat similar to the emergency bill approved by the Committee on Agriculture in the House, with the exception that it did not provide for emergency legislation for the dairy industry and livestock.

I appeared before the Rules Committee in behalf of the bill and asked the members of this committee to report out a rule which would permit amendments so that I might offer an amendment to include dairy products when the bill came up for consideration in the House. The Rules Committee once more refused to grant a rule, whereupon the Senate, by a majority, voted to recall the Norbeck bill to that body for further consideration.

It is very clear to me that the Democrats of the South are not interested in agriculture of the Northwest. They desire primarily to take care of commodities produced in the South, and when we attempt to secure consideration for legislation affecting the dairy and livestock industry they lose all interest in the legislation.

On the other hand, while the Republican Party was in control of the House of Representatives, we secured favorable consideration for legislation advocated by farming organizations, and if responsibility is to be placed on anyone for the failure of farm legislation on the part of Congress, such responsibility belongs with the Democratic Party, as they are in control of the House organization and also of all committees, including the Committee on Agriculture.

GREAT SMOKY MOUNTAINS NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 4522, to authorize the conveyance to the State of Tennessee of certain land deeded to the United States for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park and not needed therefor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to be informed by the author of this bill——.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I reported this bill out of the committee. It was called up by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to know if the land originally conveyed by the State of Tennessee for park purposes was conveyed with the understanding that if it were not used for park purposes by the Federal Government it would revert back to the State?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not sure about that, but the fact is it was acquired by the State for the use of the Great Smoky Mountains Park, and this bill now provides that it may be reconveyed to the State upon condition that the State will either exchange it for lands to be used in connection with the park, or if it is sold, that the proceeds of the sale shall be expended in the acquisition of additional lands for the park.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. Now, that being so, why is it necessary to go through the medium of the State? The Federal Government now has title to the land. Its obvious purpose is to get rid of this land and acquire other land. I do not see why we have to go at it in a roundabout way. Why can we not dispose of it directly?

Mr. BUTLER. I take it that it is because the exchange acts do not apply to these States, and there is no machinery for the Government to exchange lands in this State.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we are doing it here every day.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit in that particular, the exchange law applies only to the national forests, not to the national parks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Here they are conveying this land back to the State of Tennessee, then the State of Tennessee will either exchange this land for other land, or sell it and acquire other land within the park boundaries.

Mr. COLTON. They do not acquire other land except to include in the park, do they?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Only to place it within the park boundaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. The State of Tennessee deeded these lands. Upon subsequent investigation it was found some of the lands were not as suitable for park purposes as other lands which are now in private ownership.

It is proposed to convey a portion of the lands the State deeded to the National Government, which are now included in the Great Smoky National Park, to the State of Tennessee, and to permit the State to either exchange this land for other land within the area or to sell them and with the funds purchase additional land.

I agree with the gentleman from New York that the language of the proviso hardly carries out the intendment of the law. It leaves everything to the good faith of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Entirely. That is just what I have in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the attention of the gentleman to the wording of the proviso:

> That the proceeds of the sale of said land by the State of Tennessee shall be applied to the purchase of other desirable and unacquired land within the park boundaries in Tennessee, or, if deemed more advantageous, may be exchanged for such unacquired lands within the park area.

The language does not state that these additional lands shall be transferred to the National Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In addition to that, how can the Federal Government, how can Congress, say to the State of Tennessee what it shall do with the proceeds of this land if it sells it?

Mr. STAFFORD. That would have to be a condition in the terms of conveyance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then why does not the Federal Government sell it outright?

Mr. STAFFORD. I concluded from a reading of the report that it would be much easier for the State of Tennessee to negotiate these sales than it would be for the National Government.

The State of Tennessee donated the land. Part of the land is not as suitable for park purposes as other lands. It is intended that we turn them back to the State of Tennessee to negotiate disposition of, the State of Tennessee to turn back to the Government other land more suitable for park purposes, as I understand.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, of course, this is a matter in which my colleague on that side of the aisle, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is more directly interested; but I may say, if the gentleman will permit, that the States of Tennessee and North Carolina acquired this land and then deeded it to the National Government. The gentleman will recall that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I remember that.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. As I understand the situation has simply developed that a few spots are not as desirable as some other spots and they simply want to make an exchange.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. The States are very much interested in the establishment of this park, and they themselves are taking the initiative in getting lands that are of national-park standard, suitable to be included in the park, and are very much interested in disposing of these lands within the park boundary that are not suitable and including these other lands.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true. Of course the States are more vitally interested than anybody else in having the exchange made, and it is proposed to work it out on this basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Utah acquaint the House as to the character of these lands?

Mr. COLTON. The hearings disclose that within the boundary are lands that are really more suitable for agriculture or pasturage and are really not scenic in their nature, whereas there are some lands that are contiguous to the park that are scenic in their nature and they desire to put the scenic lands within the park and to eliminate the other lands from the park.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are certain designated tracts, I take it from the discussion, of the total acreage involved that may be exchanged?

Mr. COLTON. That is my understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any certain tracts of lands which are sought to be obtained in lieu thereof?

Mr. COLTON. So far as our committee is informed the State of Tennessee really has in mind specific tracts of land to acquire.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to convey to the State of Tennessee by the execution of appropriate deeds on behalf of the United States approximately 272.9 acres of land in Happy Valley, and approximately 2,795.2 acres of land adjoining the north park boundary of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, said lands having been heretofore deeded to the United States by said State for park purposes and now being found unnecessary therefor: Provided, That the proceeds of the sale of said land by the State of Tennessee shall be applied to the purchase of other desirable and unacquired land within the park boundaries in Tennessee, or, if deemed more advantageous, may be exchanged for such unacquired lands within the park area.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the House to some figures that are in the cost ascertainment report of the Postmaster General for the year 1931. The other day the statement was made that if Members of Congress would pay postage upon their mail matter, we would not need a new tax bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert the tables in this cost ascertainment report dealing with the cost of the franking privilege of Members of Congress and the cost of handling second-class mail matter and the revenues received therefrom.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that these tables set forth specifically the cost of the franking privilege?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. These figures show that during the fiscal year 1931 the cost of handling franked mail for Members of Congress—which includes both the House and Senate, and the official mail of both bodies, and their employees as well—was $530,298.50, or a little over half a million dollars. I ask you to contrast that with the cost of handling without charge newspapers published and mailed in the county of publication, which in 1931 cost the Post Office Department for handling, $8,425,242.11, practically sixteen times the total cost of handling franked mail.

That is what it cost the department to handle newspapers in the county of publication, for which no charge is made. Then the table sets out the losses in handling second-class mail publications exempted from zone rates and zone-rate publications, including daily newspapers and all other publications. The excess cost of handling second-class mail matter over revenues was $96,973,717.40. Contrasting that $96,000,000 plus with the $530,000 that it costs the Post Office Department for the Members of Congress to send information back to their constituents it strikes me the newspapers who are criticizing Congress for using the mails should publish these figures showing the difference in the cost of handling the two different classes of mail matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it is for official business only?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED of New York. As a matter of fact, practically all of the publishers desire copies of the RECORD sent to them, do they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman is correct. The newspapers ask for copies of the RECORD, and this is our official mail through which we transact public business. The RECORD shows that the cost of handling the penalty mail for the Post Office Department and all of the departments is $8,643,000. It is costing the Government to give free service to newspapers in the county of publication within $200,000 of as much as the total cost of handling the penalty matter for all of the executive departments combined. Keep in mind that "franked" mail is that of Members of Congress, "penalty" mail is the mail of the executive departments.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman must also realize that in that cost ascertainment there is not included the investment of over $200,000,000 in Government-owned post-office buildings and over $3,000,000 which is each year appropriated from the Treasury for custodial services under the Treasury Department. I have made an investigation of that matter and studied those tables. I find these items are not included in the cost ascertainment, and the $3,000,000 each year for the custodial service is far in excess of the entire cost of franked matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have taken the time of the House to call its attention to these figures because Members on both sides of the aisle repeatedly have the statement made to them that Members of Congress in the transaction of their official business with their constituencies ought to pay postage on that matter, while those same papers in many instances, operating private businesses, are using the mails free of charge in the county of publication, while others of them pay only a small part of what it costs to give them the service in the conduct of a private business, whereas we are carrying on public business.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The penalty mail is the official mail of the entire United States Government, with a population of 120,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That covers all of the executive departments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The whole Government; and if we did not have the penalty mail, we would simply have to appropriate an equal amount of money to carry that mail.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly. And get this: That the cost of handling penalty mail is but $200,000 more than the cost of giving the newspapers of the United States free postal service in the county of publication.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. By what law do we give free postal service to newspapers?

Mr. SIMMONS. By an old act of Congress newspapers published in the counties where they are mailed are carried free of charge in all post offices where city or village service is not involved.

Mr. WHITE. There are very few of those where such newspapers are published.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not my purpose to criticize the law; but that means, in effect, that many newspapers have practically free mail service from the Post Office Department.

Mr. ALMON. Does not the gentleman think that is in the interest of the reading public?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is in the interest of the reading public, but it is also in the interest of the public that the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate be able to correspond with their constituents on official business and to advise them of the condition of the legislative work that affects them.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to dispute the argument with respect to corresponding with our constituents, but any village that is so small that it does not have mail carriers would have very few newspapers published there.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; all through the farming sections you have these newspapers that are published in the county and have this privilege.

Mr. WHITE. And it is a fact that a great part of the newspaper mail is never touched by the Post Office Department except to put it on a pair of scales.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman probably has reference to the daily newspapers in the cities.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; because that is the only kind of paper that I have worked for and have any acquaintance with.

Mr. SIMMONS. This provision relates largely to the newspapers that are published in the small cities and towns. I appreciate the fact that the gentleman has a small district. My district is larger than the gentleman's State.

Mr. WHITE. That is the gentleman's misfortune.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I have any number of newspapers that are delivered in the various communities of the county that do not know the luxury of either village or city delivery service.

Mr. WHITE. But I want to point out, and I want this to go into the RECORD, that a large part of the daily newspapers published in the cities are never touched by the post office except to put them on a pair of scales.

Mr. SIMMONS. All right; but understand that this report shows that the Post Office Department lost in the fiscal year 1931 $34,566,247.18 in handling daily newspapers.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to know by what system of accounting they reach that figure.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what the figures in the report show.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the main reason for this service is the fact that newspapers and magazines are a medium of education.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMACK. However, I think the gentleman's remarks should have the effect of conveying to newspapers the message that at least they ought to be fair and state the truth about the franking privilege to those who read their newspapers.

Mr. SIMMONS. A lot of criticism that is directed toward Members of Congress using the franking privilege is written by editors who pay very little, if anything, to the Post Office Department for carrying their papers to their subscribers. They are charging subscription rates and are collecting advertising fees, and they are, in fact, carrying on a private business, except in so far as the benefit of disseminating information to the people is a public business.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I gladly yield to my colleague from Iowa, who has spent so many years in the newspaper game.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The House should bear in mind that all daily newspapers have their own delivery systems and they do not take advantage of the franking privilege within the county.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman listen to this? I read it a moment ago. This report shows that the Government collected in the fiscal year 1931 $11,589,084.86 from daily newspapers and it cost $46,155,332.83 to handle these daily newspapers, and that the Post Office Department lost $34,566,247.97 in carrying daily newspapers through the post office.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. But I am referring to the delivery of daily newspapers in the home cities. This is always done by their own carrier systems.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course. That is a matter that is not under discussion here.

Under the unanimous consent given I insert the following table:

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, because of the desperate situation which confronts the farmers of our country at this time, I deem it my duty to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes in their behalf.

Mr. Speaker, to-day the men and women and children living on the farms of our country are suffering. Some few are suffering because of a lack of proper food. The great majority of them are suffering from mental anguish. They are suffering because they are losing or have lost the accumulated wealth of a lifetime of frugal living. I am not referring to the speculators and gamblers who have lost money on the stock market. Farmers did not have money with which to speculate. I am referring to that great army of fine, intelligent people, many of them descendants of the Revolutionary fathers, good people, Christian people, patriotic people, the very bulwark of our civilization. They were born and reared in the country as were their parents before them. They have purchased a tract of land. On this land a home has been builded. With unremitting toil from daylight until dark and by the utmost frugality, this farm home has been paid for. Then, because of some added or unexpected financial burden, the owner of this little farm has been forced to place a mortgage on it. A son or daughter wanted to go to college, sickness or death, or possibly a marriage in the family necessitated some ready money which was obtainable only through a loan. Ordinarily such a loan could have easily been repaid within a few years. However, because of constantly falling prices since the World War, prices, which for the past two or three years have been far below the costs of production, there is no possibility for a farmer to now liquidate a debt contracted in the past. Consequently, rural banks have failed, farm mortgages have been foreclosed, farm homes are being destroyed all over our country to-day. These are the homes that in the past have furnished the leaders in all walks of life. They have furnished the healthy bodies and strong minds which have builded our cities and made our Nation great. These homes that are now being destroyed have furnished the spiritual strength which has leavened our civilization and caused us to rise as a nation. With the loss of each of these farm homes, another peasant family is born.

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that we, as a Nation, should turn our minds from foreign affairs and put our own house in order.

While prohibition is probably the most widely discussed problem in our country to-day, I do not consider it the most important. The farmers are led to believe by the city newspapers that legalizing the use of alcoholic liquors will solve all their problems. I do not think it will have any appreciable or beneficial effect on them. The increased demand for rye and barley and other crops used in the manufacture of liquors will very likely be offset by a decrease in the use of milk and other dairy products.

In my humble opinion, the most important and the most difficult problem in America to-day is that presented by economic conditions which have existed in the farming business since the deflation which followed the World War. While agriculture is the most important business in America, it has been an unprofitable business since 1919.

The American farmer is the best educated and the most skillful producer of food products in the world. He has at his beck and call the United States Department of Agriculture, the agricultural experiment stations, the colleges of agriculture with their so-called extension departments, and a county agricultural agent in practically every county of the United States. He has taken full advantage of the use of modern machinery. Consequently the American farmer is able to produce abundantly and at a comparatively low cost of production, but when he takes his products to market he has no assurance that he can market these products for any amount near what it has cost him to produce them. He really sells his products at public auction, for he must take what the buyers of these products choose to offer for them. He has no method by which he can obtain the cost of production for that which his farm produces.

Recognizing the natural handicap under which the farmer sells his products, foreign governments have adopted various artificial price-control measures. On July 11, 1932, Mr. L. R. Edminster, economist of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, stated:

> The world's agriculture is operating under the impact of a greater variety and a more widespread application of artificial price-supporting measures than ever before in modern times.

He further states:

> More significant to American agriculture is the immediate and adverse influence of many of these foreign measures upon prices of American farm products. In so far as they are applied to products competing with those grown on American farms, and in so far as they are effective, all such measures tend to reduce foreign outlets for products of which we have a surplus for export, and so intensify the competition of foreign agriculture with that of the United States.

As an example of the effectiveness of some foreign price-control measures I wish to call your attention to the price of wheat on certain European markets as compared with the price in the United States. I have before me a clipping which states:

> Prices of good milling wheat on May 20, 1932, were $1.82½ a bushel at Hamburg, Germany; $1.80½ at Paris; and $1.70⅞ at Milan, Italy.

On the same date No. 2 cash winter wheat on the Chicago market was only 58¾ cents. Thus we see that the average of the three European markets was about $1.19 above the price of wheat on the Chicago market on the same day.

During recent years in the United States the leading farm organizations have advocated the debenture and the equalization fee as methods which they think will tend to stabilize the prices of farm products above the cost of production. This legislation concerning agriculture, recommended by the Grange, the Farm Bureau, and the Farmers' Cooperative Union, so far has been denied them. Both of the major national political parties are subject to criticism in this regard. There is a lack of interest and knowledge on the part of Congress. Because 90 per cent of the Members of Congress are lawyers, unacquainted with the needs of agriculture, and because many of them are unsympathetic with the farmers, except at election time, when they want their votes, it is very difficult to enact legislation beneficial to agriculture.

In the Sixty-ninth Congress and again in the Seventieth Congress former President Coolidge vetoed legislation advocated by the farmers' organizations. During the Seventy-first Congress the Farm Board act was finally enacted into law, and I am informed that the author of this measure boasted that he did not have a farmer in his district. The debenture plan, as advocated by the Grange, has recently been defeated in the Senate during the present session of Congress by a vote of 33 to 46. The Agricultural Committee of the House has favorably reported the debenture bill and also the agricultural surplus control act bill, H. R. 12733, providing for a combination of the debenture, the equalization fee, and the allotment plan, and also an emergency agricultural relief measure, H. R. 12730.

While I realize that so long as the President insists that the Federal Farm Board is competent to handle the problems facing agriculture in this country it is useless to attempt to enact substitute legislation to take its place, I do hope that when Congress meets in December we may take up the measures advocated by the farmers, particularly the so-called 3-way bill, H. R. 12733, introduced by Mr. NORTON, and pass it, if necessary, over a presidential veto.

In conclusion, may I venture the assertion that those of you who represent city districts have an interest in the deplorable condition which now confronts the farmers of America. There can be no real or lasting prosperity in this country until our farm people are able to make a decent living. If you will restore and make permanent the buying power of the thirty millions of people engaged in agriculture, you will restore prosperity to this country.

Our city friends must learn that they can not be permanently employed unless we on the farms can sell our products to them at a profit, for their employment is very largely provided by the manufacture of the products we would like to consume but now have no money to buy. Now they of the cities are unemployed and desire to be provided for from the Public Treasury. Thus the vicious circle goes on.

The farmers of America do not want a dole, but they do want a chance to pay their debts and make an honest living. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CANCELLATION OF WAR DEBTS

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago, in discussing our foreign war-debt situation, I called attention to the fact that our former European allies, while seemingly determined to repudiate the debts they owe the United States, are spending money extravagantly for military and naval purposes. I showed that since the signing of the armistice they had spent billions of dollars on their military and naval establishments, instead of applying this money on their debts to the United States Government. I showed that France, one of the very worst offenders, has experienced no difficulty in finding plenty of money to build battleships, submarines, airplanes, maintain the largest standing army in the world, and to build a chain of fortresses along the German frontier equipped with mighty guns pointing to the heart of Germany.

If France, England, and Italy would pay only a small part of the money they are spending annually for military and naval purposes, the war-debt problem would not be difficult of solution. Their failure to do so is rank dishonesty. France, England, and Italy have ample national resources and capital to pay. Common honesty and their national self-respect should influence them to repay the money we loaned them, and without which they could not have carried on their military operations and emerged victorious from the World War that seriously threatened their national existence.

As the fruits of victory our European allies ruthlessly dismembered Germany and despoiled her of territory of almost incalculable present and potential value. Not satisfied, they levied on her an excessive and unconscionable indemnity, the payment of which would impoverish the German people, their children, and their children's children for at least a century.

After 13 years of troubled peace Germany lies prostrate beneath the conquerors' heel; denied a place in the sun, crushed, impoverished, bleeding from every pore, suffering from innumerable festering political and economic wounds, despoiled of provinces that by consanguinity and historical association for a thousand years were rightfully hers, her colonies confiscated, her armies disbanded, her resources mortgaged, her socereignty threatened, her independence menaced, and her people staggering under an unbearable burden of debt, she presents a pathetic and tragic picture of a great nation whose enemies have foredoomed her to destruction.

As Lord Byron in the fourth canto of Childe Harold said of Rome, so we may sorrowfully say of Germany:

> The Niobe of nations! there she stands,
> Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe;
> An empty urn within her wither'd hands,
> Whose holy dust was scatter'd long ago.

It will serve no useful purpose at this time to discuss the causes that culminated in the World War further than to say that the impartial future historian will acquit Germany of the sole responsibility for having precipitated the most destructive war in human history. The final verdict of history will be that all the great European nations were in part responsible and contributed to the situation that made war inevitable.

Now, while bleeding Germany white, France seeks to repudiate her debt to the United States. The people of France are exceedingly prosperous. They have practically escaped the effects of world-wide depression. Their national income, trade, and commerce are all that could be expected. Her financial system is sound, and, next to the United States, she has the largest supply of gold of any nation. Her mills and factories are active; her railroads, refinanced and rehabilitated by American capital, are prosperous. Comparatively few of her people are unemployed.

The Coolidge administration and the Mellon-Wall Street crowd canceled 52 per cent of the debt of France to the United States, 25 per cent of England's debt, 75 per cent of Italy's obligation, and made tremendous reductions in the debts of other nations. I voted against these reductions and I will vote against the cancellation of the remaining indebtedness due from our former European allies.

France, Italy, and England are asking the American taxpayers to assume the burden of the European war debts. Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy can pay their annual debt obligations to the United States without imperiling their national finance or economic systems. To make these annual payments it takes only 2.45 per cent of the Belgium budget, 2.65 per cent of the French budget, 1.41 per cent of the Italian budget, and 3.75 per cent of the British budget. How can these debtor nations claim that they can not make these annual payments to the United States without wrecking the economic structure of Europe?

As I said in the beginning, if England, France, Italy, and our other European debtor nations would spend less money for military and naval purposes, they would experience no difficulty in liquidating their war debts to the United States. Last year England spent $678,000,000 for military and naval purposes; France, $518,000,000; and Italy, $269,000,000. France now supports armed forces of 6,942,559; Italy, 5,985,597; Poland, 1,977,095; and Yugoslavia, 1,341,568.

The Fischte-Bund of Hamburg has issued a series of statements showing the extent to which Germany has contributed to the Allies in settlement of penalties imposed by the treaty of Versailles. These tables show payment in cash and in kind or property, liabilities assumed, and so forth, aggregating 71,000,000,000 gold marks, 1 gold mark being worth approximately 23 cents in our currency. In addition the Allies took from Germany 70,600 square kilometers of European territory. Nor was that all. Germany was deprived of her colonies having an area of 3,000,000 square kilometers. It is estimated that one hundred and thirty-six thousand million gold marks represent the fair valuation of the colonies and frontier territory ceded by Germany to her victorious foes under the provisions of the treaty of Versailles.

Germany's total contribution to the Allies to date may be stated as follows:

	Gold marks
German tributes paid in cash, in property, or in kind	71,268,525,800
Value of German territory and colonies ceded	136,000,000,000
Total gold marks	207,268,525,800

Reduced to dollars, this would be approximately $48,000,000,000.

I have not had time to check these tables to ascertain their accuracy. I have submitted the tables to an eminent authority on European questions and he says the figures are approximately correct. It may be that some of the amounts and payments are overstated, but it is very evident that Germany has already been severely penalized by her former adversaries.

The newspapers have recently carried an announcement that the Allies had reached an agreement with Germany by which the latter was to pay a lump sum of approximately $700,000,000 in settlement of reparation and indemnity claims. I hope no one will get the impression that $700,000,000 is the full amount of indemnity and reparations paid and to be paid by Germany. The $700,000,000 is in addition to the enormous amounts heretofore paid by Germany to her former foes, which payments consisted of cash, coal, coke, by-products of coal, dyestuffs, livestock, agricultural machinery, material and machinery for rehabilitation of devastated districts, books and prints, seagoing and river craft, locomotives and railroad cars, motors, motor lorries and other vans, war material, nonmilitary stores, transmarine cables, security surrendered, private and state mines ceded to France, landed property and buildings, debts assumed, debts against former allies surrendered, territory and colonies ceded, war vessels surrendered, and many other items amounting in the aggregate to many billion gold marks.

Of course, the United States can not interfere in the settlements between Germany and her former foes, nor can we compel the Allies to deal fairly and generously with Germany. But we can insist on our former allies paying what they owe us, especially in view of the fact that the Coolidge administration canceled one-half of these war debts. In fact, our Government canceled practically all loans made before the armistice and only demanded payment of the advances made thereafter. So the present indebtedness of our former allies does not represent money loaned them to carry on the war but represents advancements made after the cessation of hostilities.

In this connection I will say that France and Belgium are constructing a system of superfortresses on their eastern frontiers to replace those destroyed by German artillery in 1914. The keystone of the elaborate system of Belgian fortresses is at Eben-Emael, between Belgian Liege and Dutch Maastricht. This system of fortresses is constructed not only for defensive but for offensive operations, and is considered sufficient to resist any form of attack known to the military science of to-day. From these centers tons of high explosives incased in steel can be hurled across the corner of Holland into the vital spots of Germany.

Eben-Emael will be fitted with guns sufficiently powerful to shoot across the Dutch Province of Limburg and drop high explosives into the German city of Aix-la-Chapelle and surrounding territory. Moreover, Antwerp, Belgium's chief port, will be refortified, although under the treaty of Versailles the fortifications of Hamburg, a similar commercial city in Germany, were destroyed. Liege, Termonde, Namur, and Dinant, in Belgium, will be refortified so as to resist the most powerful artillery fired, and which will not succumb to the 42-centimeter howitzers of the Skoda works, as would these forts in 1914. Along the Liege-Antwerp Canal concrete dugouts will be constructed, and the general staff is now considering fortifying Ghent, in the heart of Flanders, the Belgium cotton-goods center.

On a former occasion, in discussing this matter in this Chamber, I called attention to the powerful system of fortifications France is constructing along the frontier between France and Germany. Seemingly, France is determined to remain a military nation. In view of the enormous expenditures of Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Italy for military and naval purposes, an appeal for a cancellation of their debts to the United States should fall on deaf ears. I repeat, if our former allies would spend less money on their naval and military establishments, they would have no trouble in finding ample funds to liquidate their indebtedness to the American people.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] suffered a very severe accident in a taxicab collision this morning en route to the Capitol. He will be unable to attend the House for the rest of the session, and I am asking unanimous consent that he may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, there has been more false propaganda, more misrepresentation of facts, and consequently more misunderstanding concerning the bill to pay in cash the adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans than there has been concerning any other bill during my congressional experience.

Fifteen years ago our country was engulfed in the most destructive war in human history, the most titanic conflict that ever rocked the earth. Overnight we exchanged the habiliments of peace for the panoply of war. All of our resources were mobilized. Munitions factories were established. Gigantic industries were turned into mills of war. Huge contracts were entered into by our Government for military supplies. Railroads were commandeered and operated by the Government. Millions of young men, the flower of their race, the rose and expectancy of their country, were mobilized into the greatest martial host ever assembled on this continent. Hundreds of thousands were sent across the sea to fight on foreign soil. They were the line of flesh and blood, the bulwark of democracy, the army of liberty, that stood between embattled autocracy and world dominion. Many did not come back but sleep to-day where the poppies grow "between the crosses row on row" that mark their places. Hundreds of thousands marched home, to be welcomed by waving flags, blaring trumpets, throbbing drums, and cheering countrymen. The heart of America filled and thrilled with gratitude and pride as orators acclaimed them the saviors of civilization and self-government and promised them the best of everything America would ever have to give.

Our country quickly turned from the excitement and havoc of war to the quiet pursuits of peace. Men and industries were demobilized. Those who had amassed tremendous profits out of war contracts demanded adjustments of their compensation, and were paid $3,000,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury. The railroads, claiming huge losses by reason of Government operation, asked an adjustment and received approximately $2,000,000,000. Foreign governments owed us $10,000,000,000. They asked for adjustment of the amounts due, and the United States canceled more than $5,000,000,000 of that European indebtedness.

The "saviors of civilization," the "flaming armies of liberty and democracy," asked not for a gift but for a simple adjustment of their compensation by the Government that had generously and almost unhesitatingly adjusted, at a cost of billions to American taxpayers, the compensation of huge industries and had shifted from the taxpayers of Europe to the taxpayers of America more than $5,000,000,000 of Europe's war debt. The boys in khaki, when they left their homes and loved ones, left their jobs to men who received unprecedented wages. Those boys served in camps, dugouts, and trenches, in mud and mire and blood, amid the death and devastation in no man's land, for a dollar a day, which, after deductions were made for insurance, allotments, and so forth, left scarcely anything for their own wants, while those industries whose compensation was so generously adjusted by the Government were amassing fabulous profits out of the suffering and sacrifices of a war-torn world. Those war veterans asked an adjustment of a dollar a day for the time spent in the grinding work of the training camps and a dollar and a quarter for each day of service overseas. Was that unreasonable? Other countries adjusted the compensation of their soldiers—paid them bonuses. England gave each veteran $1,427; Belgium, $492; Canada, $600 for privates and $972 for officers; France, $249.

America adjusted the compensation of the war contractors and profiteers and refunded approximately $4,000,000,000 to the payers of large income taxes on the theory that they had overpaid their taxes, agreed to accept less than 50 cents on the dollar from European debtors, and appropriated hundreds of millions for relief of European peoples. About 70 per cent of the great tax refunds were for taxes paid on war profits. A tax refund of $96,000,000 was made to the United States Steel Corporation, which had received a profit of $1,500,000 a day during the war. How did America adjust the compensation of her protectors who made possible the profits of those industries? She gave them $60 apiece, when commodity prices were at the peak, and promised to pay them $1.25 per day for overseas service and $1 per day for domestic service. When? Twenty-seven years after the armistice.

They say the certificates are not due for 13 years. Hundreds of thousands of those robust youths of 1918 are to-day broken, despairing, jobless, and their children are crying for bread. Their adjustment was due in 1918, when the service was performed. When the Secretary of the Treasury made refunds to the United States Steel Corporation and the Aluminum Co. of America, of which he was the principal owner, he paid them 6 per cent interest from 1918, not from January 1, 1925, the date of the adjusted-service certificates. The war profiteers collected interest from 1918, not 1925. The same rule ought to apply to the adjusted compensation of veterans that applied to war profiteers. Had the adjusted-service certificates borne interest from 1918, as by every consideration of justice they should have, the full face value of those certificates in 1945 would have been due October 1, 1931.

The very financial interests that received their bonuses with interest and their hundreds of millions of tax refunds from a munificent Treasury have spread the insidious and false propaganda that the proposed payment of the service certificates now would constitute a raid on the Treasury and would bring economic chaos. They proclaim that this proposal is unsound and denounce the "heroes" of 1918 as "bums" in 1932. Many who called them saviors of our country before the Hindenburg line was broken and promised those who came back America's full measure of gratitude are loudest now in excoriating the "saviors" of 1918 as the "Treasury raiders" of 1932 when they ask but a simple measure of justice, the payment of a debt that is due them now, as measured by the same yardstick used by the Government in adjusting the compensation of every other class of participants in the war. No truer thought was ever expressed in verse than in Kipling's lines:

O it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy go away";
But it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins," when the band begins to play—
For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck him out,, the brute!"
But it's "Savior of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot.

I maintain, and it can not be successfully gainsaid, that by paying the veterans' adjusted-service certificates with Treasury notes, as provided in the bill that received approximately 3 to 1 of the Democratic votes in the House, this Government would discharge with sound money a debt as honest as any bond it ever paid, without any appropriation or any increase of the public debt, and without the collection of an additional dime of taxation. Such payment would produce a reasonable and controlled currency expansion, the effect of which would be to restore commodity prices to the level of 1926 and greatly improve the financial condition of the entire country.

Most economists are in agreement on the proposition that one of our country's greatest needs to-day is such an expansion of currency as would produce a corresponding increase, or reflation, of commodity prices. The dollar is worth $1.60 as compared with the dollar of 1926, and much more than that in comparison with war-time values. Farmers who purchased land and borrowed money when they were selling tobacco for 25 cents per pound are confronted with the necessity in many cases of paying their debts with tobacco for which they receive no more than 5 cents per pound. If the farmer's debt when he contracted it was equal to 50,000 pounds of tobacco, consider his plight when he must pay it with 250,000 pounds of tobacco. The same condition applies with equal force to wheat, corn, cotton, and other basic crops.

The need for currency expansion has been recognized by this Congress. President Hoover urged the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill, which provided for the issuance of additional currency on a basis of Government bonds. We passed, and the President signed, that bill. The Goldsborough bill, which has passed the House, and the Glass bill, which has passed the Senate, also are designed to bring about expansion by issuance of currency based on Government bonds. Dr. Irving Fisher, renowned economist of Yale University, testified before the committee (hearings, pp. 658–659):

You merely need a little more blood injected into the circulation, and to get the adjustment correct, in order to accomplish this. * * * This situation is the result of too much debt and too big a dollar. * * * You have got to restore prosperity. You have got to increase the income of the people. And all of these things that I have described by which, through deflation, you have bankruptcies and unemployment and depression of trade and all the rest, are reversed the instant you have reflation.

The method of paying off the adjusted-service certificates by the issuance of Treasury notes was designed by former Senator Owen, who was chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency during the Wilson administration and coauthor of the Federal reserve act, which carried us through the World War panic proof. He is recognized as a sound student of economics and one of the leading authorities on government finance.

Without costing the taxpayers a penny this plan would substitute negotiable obligations of the Government for nonnegotiable obligations of the Government. The laws of the United States authorize expansion of the currency by the purchase with currency of Government securities. These adjusted-service certificates payable in 1945 constitute as sacred obligation of the Government as any other bond it ever issued. That is not disputed. The Treasury notes issued on this basis would be gold-standard money. No gold reserve is required for national-bank notes or silver certificates, but for Federal Reserve notes a gold reserve of 40 per cent is required. The hearings developed that these Treasury notes would not only be based on Government securities but would also have more than a 40 per cent gold reserve to support them, and under the gold standard act of March 14, 1900, would be maintained on a par of the gold dollar, backed by the full faith and credit of the United States.

This purchase by the Government of noncirculating Government obligations with circulating Government obligations would produce an expansion of approximately $2,400,000,000 of sound money, and not one authority has questioned the soundness of the money under the Owen plan, not even the Secretary of the Treasury. It would also save the taxpayers of the United States $112,000,000 per year every year until 1945, inclusive, because that amount every year goes into the sinking fund for the retirement of the adjusted-service certificates in 1945.

But what about the bonds this plan would require the Secretary of the Treasury to issue in an amount equal to the Treasury certificates thus put in circulation? The purpose of the bonds is to control expansion and prevent undue inflation of the currency. The bonds would be deposited in Federal reserve banks and would bear no interest unless they were sold. They would not be sold unless by reason of the expansion the dollar fell as much as 2 per cent below the level of 1926, when basic commodities were selling at a fair price and American agriculture, industry, and commerce were in a prosperous condition. In that event the Federal Reserve Board would sell sufficient bonds to contract the currency by withdrawing the Treasury certificates from circulation and to maintain the purchasing power of the dollar and the selling price of commodities at the satisfactory, prosperity-producing standard of 1926. Under those conditions the bonds would bear 3½ per cent interest, and who would object to 3½ per cent interest on $2,400,000,000 if its payment were accompanied by commodity prices and economic conditions such as we had in 1926.

The Nation's greatest economists do not question the soundness of a single Treasury certificate that would be issued under this plan. Their soundness was not disputed even by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is generally agreed that limited expansion of the currency, controlled as this would be under the law, by the Federal Reserve Board, is needed for a fundamental cure of the present panic and depression. It is A B C economics that such expansion would result in the much-to-be-desired upward trend in commodity prices. Currency issued under the Glass-Steagall Act is more apt to be hoarded than are Treasury notes exchanged for service certificates scattered throughout the country. The passage of this bill would cause to be paid out in Kentucky alone and placed in circulation $38,068,415.84.

The amounts that would be paid under this bill to veterans holding service certificates in each of the 17 counties of the new sixth congressional district and the counties of Oldham and Powell, in my present district, are as follows:

Bourbon	$262,953.60
Boyle	237,065.92
Casey	243,836.32
Clark	256,838.40
Estill	248,670.24
Fayette	997,986.08
Franklin	306,691.84
Garrard	168,342.72
Henry	182,931.84
Jessamine	180,995.36
Lee	141,654.24
Lincoln	257,522.72
Madison	402,161.76
Mercer	210,697.76
Oldham	107,773.12
Owen	155,937.60
Powell	84,448.00
Scott	209,664.00
Woodford	159,883.36
Total	4,816,054.88

That money would benefit not only the veterans and their dependent families but also would be of incalculable benefit to the farmer, merchant, banker, butcher, baker, lawyer, doctor, and those engaged in every other vocation, and would do more to revive business and cure depression than any other measure that has been proposed in this Congress, and it would not add a nickel to the public debt. But it would be a payment on a debt America can never pay in full, a debt as sacred as any this Government ever owed, a debt to those who risked their lives and sacrificed their health and strength 15 years ago that liberty and democracy might survive. Where would the vested interests have been but for the man power of 1917 and 1918? Oh, for a revival of the spirit of 1918! Oh, if our citizens could be filled with patriotic fervor and gratitude as was the gold-star war mother who lost her three sons. all she had, in the Battle of the Marne! After the Prussian hordes had been driven back she was permitted to visit the graves wherein reposed all that was mortal of her heroic sons. At the first grave, that of her eldest son, she knelt and said a prayer and dropped a tear. At the grave of her second son she knelt and kissed the rugged cross and wept again. When she came to the spot where slept her baby boy, hope of her life, staff and comfort of her declining years, she fell upon the moss-covered mound and poured out her great, warm, loving mother heart in a flood of tears, then rose, gazed toward Heaven, and exclaimed: "Thank God, the Republic lives!"

Yes; I voted to refute the ancient axiom that republics are ungrateful; I voted for a payment on America's debt; and that vote was right from a humanitarian, a patriotic, and an economic standpoint.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a decision by Judge McMahon, of a local court, on the interpretation of the statute passed by Congress providing that coal shall be sold by the long ton of 2,240 pounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

REPEAL OF AN ACT TO LEGALIZE INCORPORATION OF NATIONAL TRADE UNIONS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, S. 4661, to repeal an act entitled "An act to legalize incorporation of national trade-unions," approved June 29, 1886.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to legalize the incorporation of national trades unions," approved June 29, 1886, be, and the same hereby is, repealed.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced the following amendment to the existing transportation act of 1920, to limit the amount of compensation paid railway officials by common carriers by railroad which may be charged to operating expenses. It reads:

That for the purpose of the interstate commerce act, as amended, no common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of such act shall charge to operating expenses compensation to any officer of such carrier which, in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is greater than is consistent with the economical management of such carrier, and in no case shall any such carrier charge to operating expenses compensation to any such officer in excess of $50,000 a year. As used in this resolution the term "officer" means any official, counsel, solicitor, or attorney of the carrier.

The bill directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the salaries of all railway officials down to within the limits of economical management under existing conditions. It requires the reduction of the higher salaries, running as high as $121,500 a year, down to $50,000 or less, and a reduction of all other salaries in proportion. It does not authorize the commission to fix the salaries of railway officials, as that would involve a very close constitutional question and is a matter between the officials and their stockholders. It does, however, prohibit the charge of high salaries to their operating expenses which finally seep down into the rate level and are paid by the shippers in freight rates. This is the phase of the question in which the public is directly interested.

Freight rates are already too high. They are prohibitive when you take into consideration the ruinous low prices of farm products which furnish the bulk of the heavy freight and long hauls. The farmers can not continue to pay the freight rates burdened with the enormous salaries of the officials of the roads.

The existing salaries, notwithstanding the slight reductions made, are entirely out of line with the ruinous prices of farm products and with economical management of the roads under present conditions as a few illustrations will show. The Chief Executive of the United States, President of the largest corporation in the world, receives a salary of only $75,000 a year; but the president of the Pennsylvania Railway system receives $121,500 annually; the president of the Baltimore & Ohio system, $120,000 per year; the president of the Missouri Pacific system, $98,166.67 annually; the presidents of the Illinois Central system, the Union Pacific system, the Delaware & Hudson Railroad Corporation, the Chesapeake & Ohio system, the Southern Pacific system, and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad and subsidiary companies, $90,000 each annually; and the president of the New York Central system, $80,000 annually. The salaries of the many vice presidents, executive officers, and directors are in proportion.

In view of the large number of railway employees laid off and those who are now permitted to work only part time, railroad officials should voluntarily reduce their salaries below the limits fixed by my bill and expend the amount of the reduction in salaries in full-time employment and reemployment of those who have contributed their life service in the actual operation of the roads.

It is my position, and I believe the position of the railway employees of the country whose voice is not heard in this Chamber that railway officials should reduce their salaries and use the money that is saved to employ additional employees, to engage in the actual operation of the roads.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLACK. I notice on the railroad going to New York that they are not giving the service that they once did, because of the reduced number of employees.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from New York is entirely correct. The economies being made are too largely at the expense of the employees of the road and not at the expense of the railway officials whose salaries are exorbitant when compared to the existing unemployment of their employees. This is another matter in which the public is directly interested. I plead for the employees of the roads, for the conductors, the engineers, the brakemen, the men in the roundhouses and shops, with their families to support, and for those who have been laid off and now are out of employment. I plead with the railway officials to voluntarily reduce their salaries and use the moneys thus saved in the reemployment of the men who have devoted their lives to the maintenance and actual operation of the roads for the convenience of the public. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LETTER TO GOV. DAN W. TURNER, OF IOWA

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter written by me to the governor of my State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I insert the following letter written by me to Hon. Dan W. Turner, Governor of Iowa, in reply to a telegram sent by him to the Iowa Members of Congress, which was printed in the RECORD of Tuesday, July 12:

JULY 12, 1932.

Hon. DAN W. TURNER,
Des Moines, Iowa.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: In acknowledging your telegram of July 9, in which you ask Congress to remain in session until legislation is enacted to "finance real-estate mortgages" and to expand the currency until prices are lifted to the levels of 1926, permit me to say:

A bill to refinance farm mortgages, which I assume you had in mind, would have to include other mortgage debts. Such legislation by Congress could not be special, but would have to be general. To carry out such refinancing would require untold billions of dollars. To get this money we must either borrow or levy new taxes, or do both.

Additional taxes are out of the question. We have just levied a billion dollars for new taxes and we have heard the groanings of the taxpayers all the way to Washington. Under present conditions even the Government can not now borrow such additional billions as would be required much under 5 per cent. If the money is reloaned on the refinanced mortgages for less, the taxpayers would have to be called upon to pay the difference.

A Senator from North Dakota, who does business with a wave of his political hand, recently introduced a bill to refinance farm mortgages at 1½ per cent. The Senate laughed at this bill, and I think he may have laughed at it himself. It was only a political gesture, by which he hoped to endear himself to the voters in the next election.

As you are a business man, I need not point out to you the utter absurdity of the Government of the United States becoming the mortgage banker for all the people of the United States. It might be better for the Government to take over all properties and let all the people become tenants at its will—and then we would have a soviet republic.

But if you really believe that such refinancing can be done by legislation, which I do not believe, then may I suggest to you that you call an extraordinary session of the Legislature of Iowa, which is still in your care and keeping, and try this experiment on a smaller scale. In such a State experiment every mortgage will have good land for security, while in a national experiment half of the mortgages would have land back of them that is more fit to be abandoned than to be continued in cultivation.

As to the second item in your telegram—that is, the inflation of the currency—that is a matter even more serious, and I doubt whether Congress could safely undertake to deal with so intricate a problem. After eight months of strife this Congress is about worn out. Even the Speaker has become a bundle of ragged nerves and had to leave the chair. This Congress has had more extraordinary demands made upon it than any other one Congress in our history. Demands, petitions, panaceas, threats, and what not have been poured upon the harassed Members. Some have died in their tracks and many have been sent home by the doctor who keeps his office in the Capitol to be ready for emergencies. I have denounced Congress myself, but as I know the burdens that have been laid on this session I am more sorry than angry. Be a little considerate of your harassed servants in Washington.

As to inflation, the Federal Reserve Board has already gone far on this road. It has provided about a billion dollars of new circulation, and it is ready to go further as the way appears safe. The trouble is in hoarding, and that can be stopped only by the return of confidence and not by the issuance of unlimited quantities of paper money.

And when confidence is restored commodity prices will go up and so will the prices of stocks and bonds. So long as we collectively fuss and fume and accuse each other of wrongdoing and being to blame for it all, that long will we flounder in Bunyan's slough of despond. I think that little group of farmers near Mitchellville struck a finer note and pointed a clearer way to recovery than has been laid down in all the resolutions of discontent and even the platforms adopted by the two conventions in Chicago.

Iowa is sound and the Nation is sound, but the people of Iowa and of the Nation have turned their eyes too longingly and too threateningly to Washington. There is no gold mine in Washington, from which all depleted incomes can be refinanced.

Sincerely,

CYRENUS COLE.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The next business was the bill (S. 4712) authorizing the sale of certain lands no longer required for public purposes in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understand that these are all odd pieces, irregular plots no longer required, and that preference is being given to the adjoining owner to acquire them.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I reported this bill, Senate 4712, for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The committee held hearings and made a unanimous report. I would like to see the bill passed just as it is reported. The interests of the Government and District of Columbia are protected by the provisions of this bill.

I am advised by Col. U. S. Grant, 3d, Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks, that there would be at least $11,844 realized as proceeds from the sale of these five small parcels of land.

The Government acquired certain areas in the District of Columbia for the establishment of parks and opening up of streets. In establishing the parks and building the streets it was found that there were five parcels of land that were not needed either for parks or streets; that they are no longer required for public purposes in the District of Columbia. Sale would dispense with cost of caring for same.

I would like to see the bill passed without amendment, as we all have confidence in Colonel Grant in disposing of this property in the interest of the public. His record of service as Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks entitles him to this recognition. However, if unanimous consent can not be acquired for the consideration of this bill without making amendments, it may be in the interest of the District of Columbia to permit such amendments as will not interfere with the disposition of these parcels of real estate.

I am advised by Colonel Grant that parcel No. 1, containing 2,000 square feet, could not be sold for less than $4,243 under the provision of this bill; that parcel No. 4, containing 164,000 square feet, could not be sold for less than $3,123; parcel No. 5, containing 1,050 square feet, could not be sold for less than $2,670; that parcel No. 6, containing 1,680 square feet, could not be sold for less than $1,354; that parcel No. 7, containing 2,900 square feet, could not be sold for less than $454. And the total minimum sum that the five parcels would bring under the provision of this bill would amount to $11,844.

I hope that there will not be any objections raised to the consideration of this bill. It is important that it be enacted into law before the adjournment of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do not care anything about the price; but this is not the same proposition that I objected to several years ago, is it, when on a proposition of this kind several influential citizens had cut out nice back yards for themselves adjoining one of the parks?

Mr. ALMON. No; this has no connection with that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I notice the bill is rather unusual in that it prescribes that the price shall be that originally paid by the Government plus 6 per cent interest per annum since the date such parcel was acquired.

Mr. ALMON. That is the minimum amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no provision here for appraisal. I suggest a couple of amendments carrying out the thought that there should be an appraisal of these tracts of land, and that they should be sold for not less than the appraised value after an appraisal is made. I assume there would be no objection to that?

Mr. REED of New York. This is a Senate bill, and I am wondering whether it would prevent the enactment of it at this session.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have amended quite a few Senate bills.

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to expedite this. I do not think there is any great danger. The amount involved is not very large.

Mr. ALMON. Colonel Grant will take care of the interest of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to be sure that we get the appraised value at least. Then again I direct attention to the provision in section 2 wherein you grant a preferential privilege to the abutting landowners. The section reads, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said director, in making any such sale, is authorized, first, to sell any such parcel of land to the owner of lands abutting the lands hereby authorized to be sold; or secondly, to sell to the immediate former owners of any such parcel of land to be sold, provided that the price bid and payable by any owner shall be equal to the highest price bid and payable by any other bidder.

Why should we give preferential consideration to a former owner in the purchase of these odd tracts of land?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I had some experience with that when I served in the city administration in my city. It seems to be customary where there are irregular pieces of land of this description to give the abutting owner the first option to buy, in order to avoid depreciation of his property by some one buying just a small piece and using it for some purpose which would depreciate the value of the abutting owner's property.

Mr. STAFFORD. But what is the need of the second authorization—to sell to the immediate former owners of any such parcel of land to be sold.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I am talking only about the abutting owners.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I was considering section 2, I could see that some evil-minded person might make a bid for this small tract to erect a spite fence or something like that in order perhaps to exact a high price from the adjoining lot owner, and that a preferential privilege should be extended to the abutting owner, but I can not understand the second provision to sell to the immediate former owners of such parcel of land.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does that mean adjoining?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is the last owner.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would construe it the immediate prior owner.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If this land is to be sold from the public-interest standpoint to save the cost of maintenance of land which the Government can not use, then why should not the bill be so drawn that the land shall be sold under public bidding and let everyone bid. If the abutting property owners desire to purchase the land, let them put their bid sufficiently high so as to be able to buy it. Otherwise, without a provision of that kind it looks as if this is a bill not for the interest of the Government but for the particular interest of some abutting property owners who want to get their hands on this land.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to my colleague, and I know his views, because we have brushed together on that question heretofore, I think on a moment's reflection he will see that the Government will be able to get a much more advantageous price at private sale than at public sale. Let us place ourselves as interested buyers of these small tracts. Suppose the gentleman is the owner of the adjoining parcel. He does not want to see a filling station erected there, he does not want to see a spite fence erected there, on this little fractional piece of land, and he is willing to pay not only the value but more than the present value. He makes his bid under sealed offer. If I wanted to get that little parcel at a less price than it is worth I would want to have a public sale and have a stool pigeon there, and I would say, "Now, we want to beat the Government. We will only bid so high. We will have no regard whatsoever as to the value." We would be the only interested persons, and the Government would not get the same value as it would when it offers sealed bids to be submitted for these respective parcels, and then I may say to the gentleman the director is not required to accept these bids.

Mr. SCHAFER. I agree with the gentleman, and I am in favor of sealed bids, but the way this bill is drawn sealed bids are not provided for. These fellows having control of the land can sell it for what they please and to whom they please.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; not for what they please.

The gentleman will see that the minimum price as provided for in the bill is what the Government paid for it plus 6 per cent per annum since the Government purchased the property.

I have in my possession, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON], who has reported this bill, the statement as the minimum price of these respective parcels of land, the cost, and what the increment will be, as provided by the bill.

Parcel No. 1 cost the Government originally $3,381. Six per cent per annum, according to the letter submitted by Colonel Grant, made a minimum value of $4,243.

Take, for instance, parcel No. 4. The Government only paid $935 for that parcel, but the increment at 6 per cent was more than twice the original value, namely, $2,188, or a total of $3,123.

The next parcel, No. 5, has a 50 per cent increase. The next parcel, No. 6, nearly 100 per cent increase. Parcel No. 7, a 25 per cent increase.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. I want to get this clear. This is my position: I will grant that taking the interest for that period of years and adding it to the cost, the gentleman will reach the figures which he has just quoted, but then one individual will be able to buy any one of these parcels of land for these figures or $1 more, and I say if we have competitive bids we are liable to get better prices.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. We have to give credit to Colonel Grant, who is looking out for the interest of the Government. Certainly in my service in Washington, which dates back 30 years, I do not know of any time when the affairs with regard to our parks have been handled any better than they have been under Colonel Grant.

Mr. SCHAFER. Except that Colonel Grant was one of the backers of the private toll-bridge monstrosity at Great Falls, the connecting link in a great parkway, for which about $25,000,000 of the people's funds are to be expended.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree that he was wrong in that particular, but when he got enlightened by the gentleman on the floor of this House I believe he has changed his opinion.

Mr. SCHAFER. No. He is back of that bill right now to extend the private toll-bridge franchise. He changes just like some of our Democratic leaders change. They face one way to-day and they face another way to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know there are some lightning-change artists on both sides of the aisle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for a moment. I want to obtain some information. If this bill passes in the shape it is in now, granting that there is a minimum figure of the original cost price plus the interest rate, will Colonel Grant's department have to throw open the proposition so that any individual citizen can submit his bid or can he take a certain individual who has been pressing for this bill and enter into an agreement and sell this land, just because he is selling it for the minimum amount?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think an amendment I intend to offer will overcome the objection of the gentleman. In line 6, on page 1, after the word "part," insert "to the highest bidder at private sale."

Mr. SCHAFER. That will remove my objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. I must insist, on page 2, in striking out the second clause, lines 6 and 7, down to the comma, at least.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. With that understanding, I do not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, with the understanding that the proponents and members of the committee reporting the bill will accept the amendment which is to be offered by my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD], I will not object.

Mr. ALMON. That has been accepted.

Mr. PATTERSON. And also my amendment.

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, for the best interests of the United States, to sell and convey, in whole or in part, the hereinafter-described lands in his custody no longer required for public purposes, in the District of Columbia, for cash for such price for each parcel sold as shall be not less than the price paid therefor by the Government plus 6 per cent per annum since the date such parcel was acquired by the United States.

SEC. 2. That said director, in making any such sale, is authorized, first, to sell any such parcel of land to the owner of lands abutting the lands hereby authorized to be sold; or secondly, to sell to the immediate former owners of any such parcel of land to be sold, provided that the price bid and payable by any owner shall be equal to the highest price bid and payable by any other bidder.

SEC. 3. That said director is further authorized to pay the reasonable and necessary expenses of sale of each parcel of land sold, and shall deposit the net proceeds thereof in the Treasury to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in the proportion that each paid the appropriations from which the parcels of land were acquired, and shall include in his annual report a full report of the sales hereby authorized.

GENERAL RELIEF BILL AND HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the home loan bank bill and the conferees on the general relief bill may have until midnight to-night to file their reports.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this mean there is no possibility of getting the reports in earlier?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not at all. I am making this request as a precautionary measure in case we should adjourn for the day.

Mr. SNELL. It does not necessarily mean they may not be received this afternoon.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It does not necessarily mean that.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection, but I was hopeful we might get them this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggested to the gentleman from New York that he make this request. I doubt if the conferees will be able to make their report by midnight on one of the bills—the general relief bill.

If they are able to make their reports it is hoped they may submit them to-night so they may be called up to-morrow for consideration.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1: This amendment makes the provisions of the bill applicable within the Virgin Islands and to institutions organized under the laws of the Virgin Islands. (See amendment No. 5.) The House recedes.

On amendment No. 2: This amendment makes certain that only such first mortgages as are not preceded in interest by any prior lien or encumbrance shall be acceptable as collateral for an advance. Under the conference agreement the amendment is omitted as being unnecessary. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 3: Under the House bill first mortgages on dwellings for not more than three families were acceptable as collateral. Under this Senate amendment only first mortgages on dwellings for not more than two families are acceptable. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 4: This amendment makes a clerical change in a cross reference to a section. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 5: This amendment provides that the Virgin Islands be included within the area to be divided into districts for the establishment of home-loan bank districts. (See amendment No. 1.) The House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 6 and 7: Under the House bill not less than eight nor more than twelve home-loan bank districts with a bank in each district were to be created. Under these Senate amendments not more than four such districts and banks are to be created. The Senate recedes on both amendments.

On amendment No. 8: This amendment corrects a clerical error in a section heading. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 9: This amendment authorizes mortgage loan companies to become members and nonmember borrowers of home-loan banks. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 10: This amendment authorizes insurance companies to become members and nonmember borrowers of home-loan banks. The House recedes with a clerical amendment.

On amendment No. 11: This amendment authorizes trust companies, mortgage guarantee companies, State banks, and other banking organizations to become members and nonmember borrowers of home-loan banks. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 12: This amendment eliminates the requirement of the House bill that only institutions which make such home mortgage loans as, in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board, are long-term loans, could become members or nonmember borrowers of home-loan banks. The amendment adds trust companies, State banks, and other banking organizations to the class of institutions required to have such time deposits as in the judgment of the board warrant their making long-term loans. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 13: This amendment adds mortgage guarantee companies to the class of institutions eligible to membership, notwithstanding the fact that they are not subject to State inspection and regulation, if such institutions subject themselves to inspection and regulation by the board. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 14: This amendment adds a new subsection authorizing home owners coming within the limits of the act who are not able to obtain mortgage money elsewhere to obtain advances from any home-loan bank with the limitation that the provision shall not be effective when the stock of the Federal Government has been retired. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 15: Under the House bill an institution, the charges of which to the home owner create an actual net cost to him in excess of the maximum legal rate of interest of the State law, regardless of any exemption from usury laws, was ineligible to participate in the home-loan bank system. This amendment strikes out the provisions relating to the exemption from usury laws and provides that such actual net cost shall not exceed the maximum legal rate of interest and rates allowed for other charges permitted by contract or otherwise in the State. The House recedes with an amendment making the institution ineligible if the net cost to the home owner exceeds the maximum legal rate in the State, or the contract rate (regardless of any exemption from usury laws) if the State law provides a contract rate for the transaction, or 8 per cent if neither a legal rate nor a contract rate is provided by the State law.

On amendment No. 16: This amendment inserts a new section heading. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 17: This amendment increases the minimum capital of each bank from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000, to correspond with the action of the Senate in reducing the number of banks to four. (See amendments Nos. 6 and 7.) The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 18: Under the House bill if the stock investment of a member was greater than that required by the bill, the member's stock holding could be reduced and the member paid the value of stock canceled. Under this Senate amendment such member in such case can be paid no more for such stock than the amount paid in thereon. The Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 19 and 20: These amendments make clerical changes in cross-references to sections. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 21: Under the House bill stock held by the United States was to be begun to be retired when the amount paid in by members equaled that paid in by the Secretary of the Treasury. Under this Senate amendment such stock is begun to be retired when the amount paid in by members exceeds by 10 per cent the amount paid in by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 22: Under the House bill the home-loan bank board could require stock held by the United States to be retired if, in the opinion of the board, the bank had resources available therefor. This amendment adds the requirement that cumulated dividends on the Federal stock required to be paid under section 6 (k) have been paid. The House recedes with an amendment making a clerical change.

On amendment No. 23: This amendment provides that the stock of the United States shall be entitled to additional dividends to equal dividends paid on other stock. The House recedes with an amendment providing that when dividends in excess of 2 per cent are earned the stock of the United States shall be entitled to a dividend at a rate not in excess of that paid on other stock.

On amendments Nos. 24 and 25: These amendments provide that the value to be ascertained for the purpose of establishing the maximum amount which may be advanced on the security of a mortgage shall be the value of the estate mortgaged rather than the value of the real estate with respect to which the mortgage is given, as provided in the House bill. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 26: The House bill provided that no mortgage should be accepted as collateral security for an advance if it was past due when presented. The Senate amendment provides that the mortgage may not be past due more than six months. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 27: The House bill provided that the value of real estate should be as of the time the advance is made, and shall be established by certification or other evidence. The Senate amendment relates this provision not only to the value of real estate, as in the House bill, but also to the value of estates mortgaged. (See amendments Nos. 24 and 25.) The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 28: This amendment makes a clerical change in a cross-reference to a section. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 29: The House bill provided that the unpaid principal of mortgages deposited as collateral for any issue of bonds or debentures should equal 190 per cent of such issue. Under this Senate amendment the requirement relates to all bonds and debentures issued, and not to any particular issue. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 30: This amendment makes a clerical change in a cross reference to a section. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 31: The House bill provided that no advance could be made to certain participating institutions without security after the enactment of State legislation authorizing pledging and assigning of home mortgages by the institution on the expiration of the next regular session of the State legislature. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 32: This is a clarifying amendment to make certain that advances by home-loan banks to members are tax exempt. The House recedes with an amendment applying the provision to all advances.

On amendment No. 33: This amendment inserts a new sentence providing that notes, debentures, and bonds of a bank shall be accepted at par in payment of or as a credit against the obligations of a home-owner debtor of the bank. The House recedes with an amendment authorizing such acceptance only if unearned coupons are attached to the bond or debenture.

On amendment No. 34: This amendment inserts a new sentence providing that all obligations of home-loan banks shall plainly state that such obligations are not obligations of the United States and are not guaranteed by the United States. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 35: This amendment reduces the number of members of the Home Loan Bank Board from five to three. The Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 36 and 37: These amendments are clerical amendments relating to the party affiliation of members of the board. The House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 38, 39, and 40: These amendments reduce the terms of members of the board from six years to four years and make corresponding changes in the terms of the members first appointed. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 41: This amendment reduces the authorization of appropriations for board expenses for the fiscal year 1933 from $500,000 to $200,000. The House recedes with an amendment making the sum $300,000.

On amendment No. 42: This amendment authorizes national banks to incur liabilities as authorized in section 5202 of the Revised Statutes under the provisions of this act. The Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 43 and 44: These amendments eliminate the provisions of the House bill authorizing the board to fix the stock subscription of institutions authorized under section 24 to become members and provide that such institutions shall in all respects be members. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 45: This amendment strikes out the exception of national banks, State banks, insurance companies, and trust companies organized under the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia. (See amendments Nos. 9, 10, and 11.) The House recedes with an amendment which strikes out the exception of insurance companies, but retains the exception of national banks and other banking organizations eliminated from the bill by the action of the conference on amendments Nos. 9 and 11.

On amendment No. 46: This amendment authorizes United States bonds bearing interest at a rate not in excess of 3⅜ per cent to bear the circulating privilege for a period of three years after the enactment of this act. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The committee of conference have not agreed on this amendment.

On amendment No. 47: This amendment changes a section number. The committee of conference have not agreed on this amendment on account of the disagreement on amendment numbered 46.

PLACING OF UNEMPLOYED ON UNOCCUPIED FARMS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 12097, for the relief of distress due to unemployment, to create a committee for Federal, State, and local cooperation in placing qualified unemployed persons on unoccupied farms for the purpose of growing subsistence food crops during the continuance of the unemployment emergency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] I ask unanimous consent that the House consider Senate Joint Resolution 169, which is a bill of similar import, in the Committee of the Whole, and that there be one hour's general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts and one-half by a minority representative of the Committee on Labor, if a member of that committee desires to control the time in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 169, agree to its consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with one hour's debate, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on Labor if this bill was reported out by the unanimous vote of his committee?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; that is my recollection of it. I think it was; yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the Committee on Labor desires to have action taken immediately, which is now and not next November?

Mr. CONNERY. That is it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Therefore, I shall not object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the subject of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk again read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 169, with Mr. OLIVER of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution to provide information and direction to individuals and agencies concerned with relieving unemployment through finding opportunities for subsistence in rural areas

Whereas under present conditions temporary relief for some of the unemployed may be provided by aiding them to obtain a subsistence in rural areas; and

Whereas the indiscriminate settlement of such families on land is likely to subject them to difficulties and disappointments, as well as impose burdens and hardships on rural communities through increasing agricultural surpluses, and necessitating more ample provision for schools, roads, health, and other facilities; and

Whereas the likelihood of such disappointments and hardships may be minimized by information and assistance from the Department of Agriculture and other departments and agencies of the Federal Government, cooperating with State and local authorities: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to make available the services of the Department of Agriculture, cooperating with the Department of Labor, the Department of the Interior, the Federal Farm Board, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the President's Committee on the Unemployed, and other departments and agencies of the Government, in providing information to the several States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions of the States, and to individuals as to suitable opportunities and methods of aiding the unemployed to obtain a livelihood in rural communities, and in coordinating activities of State and local agencies working to that end.

For the purpose of better carrying out the objects of this resolution the Secretary of Agriculture, with such assistance as may be supplied by other Federal and State departments and agencies, is authorized and directed to encourage the formation of State organizations representing rural and urban interests through which organizations the Secretary may effectively work in coordinating the activities of urban agencies for unemployment relief with those of rural agencies in position to supply necessary information and direction for settlement of the unemployed.

The Secretary shall encourage urban relief organizations directly or through the aforesaid State organizations to make careful selection of those families whose experience and resources, as supplemented by such relief funds as may be available, fit them for earning a livelihood in the country.

The Secretary shall ascertain directly or through State and local agencies the available opportunities in rural areas for obtaining land and buildings suitable for occupancy by unemployed families, and the terms and conditions on which such land and buildings may be obtained.

The Secretary is also authorized and directed to cooperate with the aforementioned State and local agencies in formulating plans for placing unemployed on the land; and in making available the technical and extension facilities of the Department of Agriculture and of the State agricultural colleges and experiment stations in the selection of food crops and livestock for family use and for determining suitable facilities, methods, and practices.

The Secretary of Agriculture and such other Federal agencies as may cooperate with him are hereby authorized and directed—

(1) To carry out this resolution, as an emergency measure, with a view to placing unemployed persons in rural areas for obtaining a livelihood, but in such manner as will avoid so far as practicable expanding agricultural production.

(2) To discourage the transference of financial burdens in respect of unemployment relief from urban communities to rural communities.

(3) To prevent as far as possible the exploitation of the countryward movement.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the main differences between the Senate joint resolution, introduced by Senator MCNARY, and the bill which was reported by the House Committee on Labor is that in our bill, the Black bill, a commission is to be set up composed of the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, the Farm Loan Commissioners, and the Director of the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief to act as a committee to carry out the purposes of this act.

The McNary resolution provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to make available the services of the Department of Agriculture cooperating with the Department of Labor, the Department of the Interior, the Federal Farm Board, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the President's Committee on Unemployment Relief, and other departments and agencies of the Government in providing information to the several States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions of States.

For the purpose of better carrying out the objects of this resolution the Secretary of Agriculture, with such assistance as may be supplied by other Federal and State departments and agencies, is authorized and directed to encourage the formation of State organizations representing rural and urban interests through which organizations the Secretary may effectively work in coordinating the activities of urban agencies for unemployment relief with those of rural agencies in position to supply necessary information and direction for settlement of the unemployed.

The object of both these bills is to take people out of the bread lines and give them an opportunity during this emergency, if they want it, to go back on the farm with their families, and to do so after consulting with the different agencies of the United States Government—the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, the Department of the Interior—with all of these departments coordinating their activities to give information to people all over the country as to the advisability of their going back to the farm and taking them out of the bread lines.

This movement came about originally as the result of an experiment that was made by the Department of Labor. Secretary Doak of the Department of Labor sent Mr. Richardson of that department down to Greenville, S. C., saying: "There are a lot of people out of work down there. Go down and see what you can do with reference to helping out some of those people."

So Mr. Richardson went down, used his own judgment, took some of the mill hands down there and other people out of work, went to the farmers in the community some of whom had unoccupied farms and said to the owner of the farms: "Now, we have John Jones and his family. They are out of work. There is no work in the mill. What can you do to help them out? Will you put them on your farm? Will you let them raise one bale of cotton as rent and give them a year's rent for it? Will you let them raise some vegetables? Will you let them move their families out here and give the little children some sunshine and let the man raise some vegetables on your farm during this emergency? Then later, if it begins to develop that he likes to farm and if he is suitable to being a farmer, if he can gradually raise a little money from his crops and take over the farm from you 20 years or so from now, so much the better, for it would help his self-respect and would give his family food and shelter."

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. How is a city man going to raise these crops? Where is his money coming from to permit him to plow the land, to buy his cows, chickens, hogs, seeds, and so forth?

Mr. CONNERY. I am coming to that.

This representative of the Department of Labor went to the different organizations in different cities. He went to the owner of the farm. He went to the owner of the neighboring farm and said: "Will you lend a cow to this man? He has five children. Will you give him a cow, or lend him a cow? He will pay you in the future."

Then he went to some other public-spirited citizen and said to him, "What will you do for this man? Will you give him a few chickens?" Eventually he placed these 47 families on the farms, with a donation here and a donation there. Now, it is not a question of exact charity. It is a question of cooperation. He did not put people on these farms who had never seen a farm before.

You will notice that the McNary resolution uses the Department of Agriculture to discourage people from going on farms who do not know anything about farms, and who do not know anything about raising crops, and after they have been there for a while lose everything and are worse off than they were before.

Mr. SCHAFER. If you want your piano tuned you do not get a blacksmith to tune it. Is the gentleman certain that if this farm relief bill passes this Government agency will not get fellows on the farms who do not know anything about raising crops and who do not know what to do with a cow after they get it.

Mr. CONNERY. First of all, this is not a farm relief bill. It is to take people out of the bread line. It is to take thousands of people who are in the bread line in big cities and who came from farms and put them back on farms. Do not forget that. The purpose is to take people out of the bread line who have come from farms and are willing to go back to the farms. That is all we ask. We do not ask the expenditure of any money.

I will give the gentleman a perfect example of what I mean. In Milwaukee you have an employment agency representing the Department of Labor. There they are trying to get jobs for somebody in the mills or factories. However, the mills are not running or the factories may not be running or the tanneries may not be running.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the breweries are not running. If you would change the prohibition law you would put 30,000 men to work in Milwaukee at once and you would not have to be pussyfooting and camouflaging about a bill like this.

Mr. CONNERY. I know the gentleman is not referring to me in that respect, because he knows I have always voted wet.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman knows that if we followed the Democratic platform, which pledged an immediate change of the Volstead Act, we could put several hundred thousand men at work throughout the country and put hundreds of millions of dollars into a badly battered Treasury.

Mr. CONNERY. I am perfectly willing to vote for such a proposition, but at this time I am interested in hungry men, women, and little children.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am very much impressed with the gentleman's argument. I would like to ask my friend from Wisconsin, with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether or not he is going to run for reelection to this body on the Republican platform with reference to prohibition?

Mr. SCHAFER. I always run on my own platform, my legislative record, and my service. If the gentleman will look at my record he will see that it is wet.

Mr. McCORMACK. But I asked the gentleman if he was going to run on the Republican platform with reference to prohibition?

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not merely talking wet when running for office and not voting that way, like many dry Democrats from the South, who vote dry and yet say they are for the Democratic platform, which pledges immediate change of the Volstead Act. I shall run again on a platform favoring the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act.

Mr. CONNERY. I dislike to have the prohibition question brought in at the present time. I am interested in the unemployed men and women of the country. However, I want to say to the gentleman that I vote wet and will support any wet bill. But, as far as I am concerned, before the wet-and-dry issue comes the bread-and-butter issue, unemployment issue, and the relief of hungry men, women, and children.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Who is to take care of these families while the crops are coming in? The gentleman knows you can not raise chickens overnight and that it takes time to raise crops.

Mr. CONNERY. I will say to the gentleman that these people who are to be put on these farms have nothing. The gentleman will understand that. But they will be helped by the different organizations and public-spirited citizens, so that they can go on the farm and have something with which to make a start. That will take care of them for a little while.

Mr. WATSON. It is not a matter of a little while but it is a matter of months before anything can be produced on a farm. I have lived on a farm and I know all about it. What I want to know is whether someone is going to give these farmers sufficient money to care for them while the crops are growing.

Mr. CONNERY. It is not a question of money in this proposition. It is a question of getting something to eat. It is a question of the difference between having these people on the farms or in the bread line.

Mr. WATSON. What is the difference between money and something to eat? It takes money to buy something to eat.

Mr. CONNERY. In any event they would have to be cared for by welfare organizations. I wish I had the pictures which Mr. Richardson had showing the benefits which had come to the children who were put on these farms. They received great benefits by reason of the air, sunshine, and decent food they got on these farms.

Mr. WATSON. I am not questioning that, but I want to know who is to supply the products to take care of them while they are waiting for some returns from these farms.

Mr. CONNERY. These people are not to stay on the farms forever. They are only going to stay on them during this national emergency. The idea is to put them on the farms and take them out of the bread line, and use the money which the welfare organizations would have to give them to help them on these farms.

Mr. WATSON. The winter is coming on. They can not plant anything now and get any return until next spring.

Mr. CONNERY. All right; they are going to be kept during the winter somehow. They are going to stay in the bread lines if something is not done.

Mr. WATSON. I suppose so.

Mr. CONNERY. We are trying to take them out of the bread lines and let the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Labor use their power and their brains to see if it is not possible to put these people who have been on the farms back on the farms and try to get them going in this way.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] to the fact that these people would at least have a roof over their heads and if they had these chickens they might have eggs the first day, and they would milk the old cow twice a day from the very beginning.

Mr. WATSON. But the cow would have to be in production. You can not milk a dry cow.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman is assuming it would be a dry cow, while I am assuming it would not be.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that the departments can do just as much without this bill as they can with it?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I do not think so. The gentleman knows from his experience here that if the Congress suggests something to a department it will go a long way to try to put that into effect.

Mr. TABER. Does the Department of Labor want a lot of money to operate this plant?

Mr. CONNERY. No; not a cent.

Mr. TABER. Then there is not anything suggested here but what can be done just as well without this bill.

Mr. CONNERY. They have appeared here in favor of the bill.

Mr. GARBER. This bill authorizes the various departments to cooperate, and without such authorization they would not be authorized to do so.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true.

I shall not take any further time, because there are other gentlemen to whom I wish to yield.

I yield five minutes at this time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think, of course, that this bill is going to be any cure-all for the unemployment situation, but the Department of Labor has demonstrated beyond any doubt by an experiment at Greenville, S. C., that the plan can be helpful. They took 42 families from the mill sections of that city and put them on farms adjacent to the city of Greenville, where they were enabled to help feed themselves.

The purpose of the plan is to have the cooperation of the Federal agencies, with the local charitable organizations in the cities, so as to take people from the bread lines, who have formerly lived on farms, and enable them to produce some of the food which must be given to them.

It seems to me it is worth while for the Government to put the stamp of approval on this plan, which is already being used in numerous cities throughout the country.

We know that a great many of the people who are idle in the cities to-day are former residents of the farms of this country. They were attracted to the industrial centers by high wages, which no longer exist. Why would it not be better to have the charitable organizations, with the cooperation of these Federal agencies, put some of these people, who can be found by the Employment Division of the Department of Labor, back on the farms where they can at least produce some of the food necessary to feed them?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Certainly.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman propose to find idle farms to put these people on, or will they be taken on as tenants on farms already occupied?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The purpose is to find idle farms and to place them with farmers who can use their labor. This is what was done in Greenville.

The Federal farm land banks have numerous idle farms and the Department of the Interior has some idle land in the West, and the idea of putting all these departments in the bill is that they may all cooperate with local charitable organizations and give the unemployed who have had farm experience an opportunity to at least produce some of the food which they are now being given in idleness.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I understand it to be the gentleman's intention to put these men on Federal land bank farms?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The purpose is to put them on any land that is available. It may be land that can be rented at a very reasonable figure. Both Federal farm land bank farms or any other farms that are idle and which may be contributed for this purpose during this emergency will be used.

Mr. GRISWOLD. How will they handle land bank farms with respect to the bondholders?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They will not be hurt if the farms are standing idle.

Mr. GRISWOLD. They would have an interest in the matter and would have something to say about it.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand, there is no cost to the Government involved here.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No. It simply authorizes the Federal departments to do something that they are not now authorized to do.

Mr. BRIGGS. And it is just to afford an opportunity to take care of some of the unemployed and make the families self-sustaining where otherwise they would be without any resources whatever.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is the case exactly. It does not cost the Government a cent in the world except the time that may be spent by these Federal agencies, for which, of course, they will be paid out of the regular appropriation.

It is certainly better to take the people out of the bread lines in the cities and put them where they can raise vegetables and where the charitable organizations can give them chickens and cows, and it would certainly be cheaper for the people of the cities who are now having to support these people in idleness to contribute something that would give them an opportunity to help the situation themselves.

I can not see any possible objection to it. I can not see where it would entail any cost upon the Government, and yet I can see where it would be a great thing for the people who are now congregated in idleness in the cities and who are willing and anxious to work, but can not find any way to get a job.

I hope the House will pass the measure promptly.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. This would be more helpful and more elevating if continued and would improve the character of citizenship over that which now results from association in the bread line.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is true; and that was the experience reported by the Department of Labor in the matter at Greenville.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the original House bill at the suggestion of Bernarr MacFadden, who is greatly interested in the Department of Labor's experiment at Greenville, which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has just spoken of.

I have seen the bread lines in New York City. I have seen honest Americans in that line waiting hours for a cup of coffee and a sandwich. Many of these people would be far better off if they were out in the rural districts on a farm. I have seen many uninhabited farms on my way here from New York, and it was only logical, as it seemed to me, that these people should be taken off the bread lines and put on these farms, where they could have something to do and get something to eat.

In New York State our governor has taken care of a great number of people, taken them from the bread lines and put them on unused farms. Two hundred and twenty-four families which were on the bread line have now been put on farms in New York and are living happily.

The people are going back to the farms. In times of distress people go back to the land. They are going back, without any idea of what is going to happen when they do get back, and we want to have some systematic plan of migration. We want a systematic migration back to the land, so that there will be some chance for these who are going back, and so they will not interfere with those who are already on the farm.

Mayor Walker and Commissioner of Public Welfare Taylor are doing what they can for humanitarian reasons. They are buying transportation for these people out of New York City. It is far better that they leave our bread line and go back to the land, where they will find shelter and find something to eat.

This bill authorizes the Agricultural Department to cooperate with various local agencies to find unused farms, and to find some help when they get back, so that they will be able to carry on and be able to get a living. It is to enable people who want to go back, who want to get away from starvation and breaking down, and when they finally do get to the land they may be able to carry on. Now, this does not cost the Government a cent.

It does not cost the Government a dollar, it is no burden on the taxpayer, and I really believe after the experiments conducted in Greenville and in the State of New York that this will be a fine step to relieve unemployment in a sensible fashion. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that I have discovered who was responsible for instigating the Black bill. It must have been a physical culturist or a magazine publisher, for the bill had everything in it. They were going to take the Federal land-bank lands without the consent of the bondholders or anybody else and put these people on them.

I have the deepest sympathy in the world for all the unemployed in the cities, but they were invited to the cities in times of prosperity, if they went from the farms. In this bill there is no provision made to take back anybody who is acquainted with the farm. You can take a soda jerker or a machinist or anybody else back there and you can take him there and try to make him make a living in a manner about which he knows nothing. There is no provision in the bill to keep these people during the time from now to the time that they can make a crop, which may be two or three years. They are going to just unload all these people from the city onto the country.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And it is a certainty that anybody placed on a farm at this period of the year could not possibly produce a crop before next year.

Mr. GRISWOLD. That is true. These farmers now on the farms are all destitute, they can not pay their taxes or mortgages, and their farms are being foreclosed. With these people on the farms unable to make a living, how do you expect these unemployed people to do it. The idea is to take them out there and load them onto an already destitute agricultural community. I have not had an opportunity to look over the provisions of the bill under consideration, but the Black bill provided that they were to be taken care of by responsible agencies.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The matter now before the House is the McNary joint resolution, and one of its parts reads as follows:

> Whereas the indiscriminate settlement of such families on land is likely to subject them to difficulties and disappointments, as well as impose burdens and hardships on rural communities through increasing agricultural surpluses, and necessitating more ample provision for schools, roads, health, and other facilities.

He wants nobody to go back to the farm who is not able and ready and willing to take care of himself when he goes to the farm.

Mr. GRISWOLD. That is just the question.

Mr. CONNERY. That is what we want to do.

Mr. GRISWOLD. You are going to take people back to the farm who have had experience on the farm, and perhaps have been away for years, to try to make a living, when the man who has been there working on the farm all the time can not do it.

Mr. COLLINS. It seems to be the theory of this bill that the way to relieve unemployment is to get rid of them by putting them on some other community.

Mr. GRISWOLD. By dumping them on the farm. I want to see these men employed. I have worked for it in the Committee on Labor; but the way to employ them is to put them to work where they are.

Mr. CONNERY. I know the gentleman's sympathy, and I know how sympathetic he is to anyone who is out of employment. The gentleman saw the pictures of those little children of 47 families taken out of Greenville, S. C. Even if we gave these children nothing but good air and sunshine and decent milk to drink, the passage of this bill would be worth while.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I remind the gentleman that in little towns and in agricultural communities to-day there are little children who have nothing.

Mr. CONNERY. But they are better off than those little children whose fathers are in the bread line. They have no milk.

Mr. GRISWOLD. This condition is general, and you are going to make it worse; you are going to unload people on these destitute communities when you take them from the cities. Let those who prospered from them in their days of prosperity take care of them now in their days of destitution. [Applause.]

It is not fair to either the unemployed or the farmer. You make the unemployed a charge on a strange community for a year until the crops come, and then, with free seed, free implements, free rent, and no taxes, he competes with the farmer, who must pay for all these things.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when the House bill came near to consideration when the Committee on Labor had its day on Calendar Wednesday I was hopeful it might be considered. For a long time I have been of firm opinion that one of the most potent ways to relieve the industrial depression and remedy the destitution so general in our industrial centers is to follow the example so general in Europe, especially in the densely populated districts of continental Europe, as in Germany, Sweden, and the like, and provide small patches of land so that the individual tiller might be able to eke out a fair existence.

Everyone knows that a man can provide for himself and family substantially on a small tract of land, say, 10 acres, with a cow and a hog and the cultivation of the soil. I was surprised when an irrigation bill was under consideration to hear the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] say that there are vast tracts of land in Colorado suitable for cultivation but that the former owners had trekked away to the large industrial centers. Anyone who is acquainted with the way people generally have gone to Detroit, have abandoned the farms in northern Wisconsin and other places to get the high wages paid in industry when it was at its peak, knows that the one way to give at least a living to those destitute in the cities is to provide them with homes on small patches of land that will support a family.

I, for one, in these crimping times, would favor the Government voting a thousand dollars from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to place a man on an untilled patch of ground so that he might make a living. How else are we to relieve this destitution? There is no other panacea. If we are going to extend the tariff wall so high that our surplus production can not be distributed abroad, what are these persons who were formerly occupied in industrial centers going to do? If they till the soil, it will be possible for them to make a living. That is all this bill provides. It simply enables the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish to these persons who sincerely want the means whereby to make a living information which is at the command of the Government to go to these tracts of land, untilled and unoccupied, formerly cultivated, so that they may be able to maintain themselves and their families in a small way. There is no intention for them to go into competition with agriculture generally. It is merely a means to provide them with a means of sustenance.

No person with a heart who knows the dire conditions existing in our industrial centers could oppose this proposition. I know the conditions in the industrial centers. Walking down Woodward Avenue, Detroit, one Sunday morning on my way to church, about two months ago, a man and woman came to me with two little children begging for alms.

Could I refuse them? Who could? He was there. He had come to seek work in that large industrial center. There was no opportunity for work. The automobile industry was flat. If we could say to them, "You have cultivated a little piece of ground abroad; you know how to make a living," and give them a piece of land and means of production, we could cure to that extent the poverty question that is threatening our industrial centers, and will continue to threaten them until we give some means of relief.

You, Representatives from farming communities, do not think for a minute we are trying to make added surplus to farm production. No. It is only to let these men who are able-bodied, with families, engage in activities so that they can make a living for themselves. For humanity's sake let us do something for the downtrodden man. We have done nothing so far. I grant it will not relieve the cotton planter in the South, but even there, they can raise their little garden; they can have a cow and a pig and the like, and they can make a step onward toward relieving themselves and those dearest to them by cultivating God's native soil. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in theory this bill is perfect. If the sincerity and eagerness of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] could be translated into something actual, we would have a perfect plan here; but as a practical proposition this bill is just zero. The only kind of a paying farm to-day is a truck farm near a center of population, and such a farm would not be available for this purpose.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not just now.

Mr. CONNERY. That is just what we wanted to do.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. I have talked with General Underwood, of the Salvation Army, who has a deep interest in this proposition and who has complete plans for moving several thousand people from the cities onto these farms; and also with Mr. Avalon, representing the Hecksher Foundation; but they couple with this proposition the necessity of an appropriation of several millions of dollars. Without an appropriation to take care of these people on the farms, it is worthless. Not even the unemployed can live on air as some of our statesmen believe they can. Let us assume there is available land, and these people, who are inexperienced as far as farming is concerned, are taken from the city and transplanted to the farm. They must be equipped with farm implements; they must be provided with transportation; they must be equipped with livestock; they must have horses or an auto, and therefore feed or gas; they must be equipped with seed, with fertilizer, with food and clothing during the winter season, and if they can be maintained that long, by the time the crop is harvested, then the tax collector will come along and take whatever there is left.

Now, this idea of moving from the city to the farm is ideal. Poets have sung about it for a long time, but as a practical proposition we have migration from the farms to the cities, and everything is not what it once was on the farm. It is a hard, practical proposition. Capital is necessary for farming; experience is indispensable.

Now, as an experiment, of course there can be no objection to this bill. I doubt that it will work out. It has been tried many times before and has always ended in failure or cruel exploitation. I know that the people back of this plan are absolutely sincere. I also know that every day we are confronted here with the problem of surplus farm products created by lack of purchasing power of the American people. It would seem to me we should strive to increase the purchasing power and not increase farm production. Only this morning we had a very interesting debate on that proposition. The gentleman from Wisconsin points to the dire distress in the cities. We know it; I tried to make Congress realize it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is an authority on that subject, because as chairman of the Committee on Labor he has given it a great deal of thought and study; but I can not subscribe to the theory suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, out of his good Christian heart, of going out and begging a cow and going there and asking for a couple of chickens. That may do in an individual case or isolated instance. My God! we must do more than that. We have to give the unemployed American citizen a square deal and not charity. We have to take care of him and provide work and decent wages; we must do something real and permanent. This bill is not the solution—a cow, a chicken, a sack of flour, a bit of charity, and perhaps an exploiting landlord. We must face the situation. We must come down to the 6 or 7 hour day. We must come down to the 5-day week. We must provide economic security by providing a national system of unemployment insurance. Those are the things that will solve the problem. As long as we waste time with palliatives we will get nowhere, except nearer social upheaval. Even the $300,000,000 relief which was authorized the other day and propositions of this kind are not sufficient. Experiments in colonization, every time they have been tried in this country, have resulted in a failure or, as I have said, in exploitation. The relief hoped for will be so infinitesimal and so small that it will have no effect at all. It will not even be noticeable.

I am not criticizing the purposes of these gentlemen. I know Mr. Bernarr MacFadden is sincere and earnest. He may do well with individual cases. If we expect to transplant a hundred thousand unemployed city families to the farms it will require several million dollars to keep them there. I know they have done everything that is humanly possible to bring about some relief, but let us not deceive ourselves. This will not produce any effective good. It can not, by the very nature of the proposition.

I submit we must stop ineffective palliatives.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York two additional minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman knows the Committee on Labor—and it almost gives me a laugh to-day when I think of it—last January reported out this $300,000,000 relief bill which President Hoover is taking credit for to-day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not care who takes the credit; I am sure the gentleman does not care. I am only concerned in getting relief for the needy unemployed.

Mr. CONNERY. The Committee on Labor had two relief bills. There were two Black bills. One of the Black bills called for an appropriation of $10,000,000 and the other Black bill did not call for the appropriation of a dollar. The committee knew that if it reported the Black bill calling for the appropriation of $10,000,000 it would not have a chance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the parliamentary difficulties. I am not criticizing the gentleman. I feel sorry for him in the hopelessness of trying to get something that is effective and real at this time when the leaders of American politics have not yet realized the seriousness of the situation and are unable to see the coming storm.

Mr. CONNERY. We are trying to get a cow, a chicken, or a hog to help them, that gentlemen have referred to here.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps the multimillionaire publisher who is the real author of this bill, Mr. Bernarr MacFadden, can furnish a couple of cows and chickens to these people and give them a year's subscription to True Stories or to True Romance Magazine.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me say in all fairness, Mr. MacFadden will contribute more than his share, and has been doing so, and I am sure will continue to do so. He is a fine, splendid, public-spirited citizen.

Mr. SCHAFER. I want to be fair. I say in all sincerity that Mr. MacFadden, the multimillionaire publisher, might divest himself of some of his money to help the needy and not merely have introduced a camouflage proposition here as a gesture. Some of the other multimillionaires in this Nation should divest themselves of some of their millions to take care of the needy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sure Mr. MacFadden will do his share and will perhaps in addition furnish a subscription to Snappy Stories to the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman could read that.

Mr. BLACK. He has been a fine example to the citizens of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill is not a complete and comprehensive bill, but it is a step in the right direction.

There is no scarcity of wealth or food in the United States, but in spite of all the wealth and all the food in the United States we are confronted with the fact that 10,000,000 or more people are to-day unemployed, and a large number of them begging their fellowman for something to eat.

I would like the gentleman from New York to explain in his own time the difference between handing a man money, as we are doing daily on the streets, and giving him a cow to help him produce something to eat.

Almost any way you turn you are confronted with one or a dozen people begging you to give them something to purchase the next meal with. And we who are employed are giving, many of us, even beyond our means. Frankly, I am glad to divide any sustenance that I may have with anyone less fortunate.

In this dark financial age we find that even the wisest of the wise are destitute for a solution of our existing problems. Why a few months ago we found our Farm Board officials, or Department of Agriculture officials, advising cotton growers to plow under every other row of their cotton instead of picking it. Such folly indicated the hopelessness of the officials' destitution in solving the problems existing. Weak and unworkable remedy after remedy has been offered to the Congress. Some of them have even been accepted by the Congress, only to later reveal their utter unworkableness. Why, a Congressman from a Western State told me recently that oats were selling in his State for 8 cents per bushel, and that it took 4 cents to thresh them and about 4 cents for seed. I ask you, can these conditions long continue? They can not. We must reestablish the purchasing power of the farmer, and until such time as tariffs, debentures, and other measures can be enacted we should assist the unemployed all possible to cultivate land and make something to eat. This depression has been of long duration, and I fear may last much longer.

This bill would be a step in the direction of getting people to go back to idle lands, or to go to idle lands for the first time, if you please, and there from the breast of mother earth wring an existence to feed themselves and their families.

They are tired of begging on the streets for something to eat, and if they are assisted back to the land, or to the land for the first time, it is hoped that they will make something to eat from their own efforts and not be confronted with the embarrassment of begging someone to give them something to eat. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is the most humiliating thing for an able-bodied man who desires a position and yet is hungry to ask someone to give him something to eat. This is what we are confronted with, and millions of acres of land in our country which would produce something for these men to eat are idle.

Mark my words, our industrial centers will not and can not provide employment for the people in their midst. It is inevitable that these great masses of population must, now or later, go back to the land and there make something to eat. They will become more and more tired of asking for something to eat in the streets. The man of medium means, or the man of great means, will get more and more tired of having to divide his earnings and his money with them. It is inevitable. They must go back or must go to the land for the first time and make something to eat. Millions and millions of acres of land are idle with no one there producing anything to eat, and on the other hand 10,000,000 people desire employment which can not be obtained.

I am not willing to say that our industrial system has collapsed. I am not willing to say that this depression will go into a panic and that conditions will grow worse and worse, but I want to remind my colleagues of recent history. Some 40 or 50 years ago men were working on farms for 25 or 30 cents a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. They were proceeding along in an orderly way and rearing their families and maintaining themselves on that meager wage. But during the new age, this great golden age, things have rapidly changed to where now we have discontent, to where now we have poverty, to where now our middle class is being rapidly eliminated, and we have the pauper class rapidly developing and the millionaire class losing their wealth.

Mr. Chairman, something must come about immediately to change this condition. This bill is no cure-all, but it will give the assistance of the Department of Agriculture, its county home-demonstration agents, and its other facilities without additional appropriations to guide the people in their efforts to become self-sustaining. Mr. Chairman, with self-sustenance come courage and independence. The farms have always produced our great leaders in finance, industry, and statesmanship. To-day we must encourage a rehabilitation of the farm and farm life. The Nation is already calling for the leadership that our farm communities once gave. The vast populations must depart from the congested industrial centers and cities and once again become self-sustaining on our vast and fertile farm, pasture, and prairie lands. Herein lies the real hope for the bright destiny of America. The wealth of our Nation is being rapidly destroyed by the selfishness of those who hold it. This process of elimination and leveling down may continue to work its own way, but that which really concerns us to-day is the development of the great leaders that our Nation so badly needs. This can be done noly through the development of a new rural life with self-sustaining and independent rural population, far removed from selfishness, corruption, and turmoil.

And may I predict that some 10 years from now instead of your congested industrial centers you will find the most choice of our American people going along on the farms of our Nation, in a happy condition, there enjoying their freedom and independence. By the sweat of their honest brows, laboring beneath the blue canopy of heaven, they will still be wringing their living from the breast of Mother Earth. These people will then be the hope and inspiration of America as they were some 40 or 50 years ago. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for the privilege of participating in this discussion. I do so only for the purpose of calling attention to the evidence of an abysmal lack of information regarding the woeful conditions of agriculture, and it is without any criticism whatever in regard to the distinguished but misguided gentlemen who are championing the enactment of this measure.

The purpose of the bill is to establish the unemployed upon the abandoned farms of the country, to enable them to produce farm products for their consumption. The argument made in support of the measure by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] and by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is commendatory of their sympathy and their zeal to relieve congested conditions of unemployment in the large cities which they so ably represent. But, Mr. Chairman, that zeal and that misdirected energy is only evidence of a total lack of information regarding the conditions which now prevail throughout the farming districts of the country.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I gladly yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman accuse the Secretary of Agriculture of having the same lack of information? He approves this bill.

Mr. GARBER. No; I do not accuse the Secretary of Agriculture of a lack of information. He stated in his letter the tragic conditions of the farm, but expressed his willingness to assume the responsibility if it were imposed upon him by Congress. He could do nothing else and is not to be criticized for it. He is not in sympathy with this movement. What I said was not in any spirit of criticism of the motive and purpose of the gentlemen championing this bill and this organized effort to encourage the movement back to the farm, which would only diminish the market for farm products already selling below the cost of production.

Coming from the farm, it is my purpose to give you some actual information of the existing conditions confronting the farmers of this country. Do you know that during the last several years over 1,000,000 farmers have been dispossessed of their farms and, through foreclosure proceedings, have been turned out into the road to search for shelter and sustenance in their helpless condition? Do you know that the farmers still remaining are unable to meet their local taxes, their interest and their coming-due obligations? Do you know that the indebtedness of agriculture, including chattel mortgages, exceeds $12,000,000,000? Gentlemen, as a commercial proposition, agriculture has collapsed. It is only now a temporary shelter for the men and women who have been producing the food for you gentlemen in the East below the cost of production. Agriculture is homeless to-day so far as its financial condition is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma an additional minute.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentlemen for the privilege of continuing for two additional minutes.

Do you know that during the last 10 years the farmers of this country have been producing below the cost of production, year after year, and are now in a helpless condition, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]? Do you know that they have been doing this to the extent that they have exhausted all their financial resources and almost all the equities in their land? How do you expect the farmers of this country to continue production at a loss with all their resources already exhausted?

This session of Congress convened on the 7th day of December, 1931. With full knowledge of these conditions, the House majority has continuously refused a rule to consider the major agricultural bills reported out by the House Agricultural Committee. This is the 14th day of July, 1932, believed to be the next to the last day of the session, and the pending measure is the only answer to our repeated requests, our persuasions, our arguments, our pleadings to report a major bill that would be effective in its direct relief to the farmers of the country. The purpose of this bill is not to relieve existing conditions but to aggravate and intensify them by increasing the number on the farms and diminishing the market for farm products.

You have this day refused to grant a rule for the consideration of the Norbeck bill, passed yesterday by the Senate. That bill declared an emergency. It invoked the war powers of the Government. There is no question but that an emergency greater than that which existed during the war exists at the present time.

At that time the Food Administration fixed the minimum price of wheat at $2.20 per bushel. This bill does not fix the price. It simply adds the tariff duty to whatever price prevails and gives it direct to the farmer producing any or all of the three basic products, namely, 42 cents per bushel on wheat, 2 cents per pound on hogs, and 5 cents per pound on cotton for that used in domestic consumption. It does this without any additional cost to the taxpayer or appropriation from the Treasury. It levies and collects a process charge from the miller of 42 cents per bushel on wheat, from the packer of 2 cents per pound on hogs, from the cotton manufacturer of 5 cents per pound on cotton, and likewise on the manufacturer of silk and rayon to provide protective compensatory duties to cotton.

It requires the Internal Revenue Department to make these collections the same as it does the income taxes, the moneys from each source to go into separate funds in the Treasury Department to cancel the adjustment certificates issued direct to the farmers when they sell their products used in domestic consumption. Such certificates are redeemable at any Government fiscal agency designated by the Treasury, less certain administration costs not exceeding 2½ per cent, redemption to be made at any time after 30 days and not more than one year from the date of their issuance. The certificates would be issued direct to the farmer on his production of any one or all of the three basic commodities mentioned and marketed by him for domestic consumption whether from this year's production or from hold-over production at the time he sold.

The bill would enable the farmer to receive a domestic price for that which he produced of the three basic products for domestic consumption, the amount of the domestic consumption to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, which is clearly ascertainable over a period of five years. To illustrate: If the estimate declared the home consumption of wheat to be 75 per cent, the farmer taking 100 bushels of wheat to market would receive adjustment certificates for 75 per cent of that amount upon satisfactory proof of such production and sale. Excess production for export for which a processing charge had been collected would receive its refund and processors would be permitted to process in bond for export without the payment of process charges.

It is true the bill only applies to three commodities, but they are basic. Their increased prices would lift the prices of all other farm products.

In form, the bill embodies the allotment plan presented to the several committees of the House and Senate by the Hon. John Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, a recognized authority on agricultural economic conditions. It was agreed upon by the representatives of the three great farm organizations. Four months ago they insisted upon its immediate consideration and enactment. It embodies the most direct relief to the producers of any bill yet presented to Congress. It is not complicated. It is not loaded down with unnecessary administrative machinery. It requires no appropriation. It is simple, direct, workable, sound, and effective. Why did your Rules Committee, composed of eight of the majority and four of the minority, refuse to-day to report out this bill for which the farmers of this country have been waiting and which was passed by the Senate yesterday without material opposition? To-morrow the gavel will fall, and this Congress will adjourn.

In the face of your refusal to grant a rule and consideration of the bill or to enact any substitute, what will be your explanation to the farmers of the country? The representatives of the farm States have insisted upon this legislation. They were entitled to expect it in view of the legislation which they were induced to support and which you now admit has not been effective as yet to relieve the country from the existing depression. And now you bring in this bill to establish the cities' unemployed on the land. What about the millions of farmers already dispossessed, unemployed, and homeless?

What a debacle. What an absurd climax to the boastings, the pratings, and protestations of the championship of the farmers of the country. How do you expect to increase the price of farm products and restore the purchasing power of the farmers by increasing production as proposed by the bill under consideration, a little popgun bill that amounts to nothing except in so far as it would aggravate and intensify the deplorable conditions now existing?

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, permit me to say there are 40,000,000 people living on the farms of this country. When they lost their purchasing power you gentlemen in the East, in the large cities of the country, lost your employment for labor. What is the remedy? Not to increase production, not to increase the numbers on the farms, but to restore the purchasing power of the farmers still remaining. When you restore that purchasing power you restore the purchasing power of 40,000,000 people. When that is done you will have established a market for the production of your industries in the East. Your mills, your mines, your factories will start up; labor will be reemployed; capital will invest; and the farmers of the country still hanging on with better prices and restored purchasing power will lift you out of this depression. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, at the invitation of our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], a group of Members of the House interested in the subject of agriculture assembled together on several occasions for the purpose of considering the possibilities of legislating in the interests of the farmers of America. This group from every section of the country gave freely of their time and energy in an effort to promote and advance the cause of agriculture. An executive committee was selected to represent the group before the Rules Committee and in the necessary conferences with the leaders of the House.

I was honored by being designated as chairman of the executive committee and, together with my associates, we conferred with the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, the Hon. MARVIN JONES, of Texas, who in my judgment is one of the best authorities on the subject in the country. We also called upon the Speaker and the majority leader of the House, both of whom are vitally interested in the question, as was indicated by the introduction of the emergency agricultural relief bill by Mr. RAINEY. During the course of our study of this all-important question we recognized the impossibility of passing a real emergency relief bill at this session, as the record clearly indicates that not one of the measures indorsed by any of the national farm organizations has an opportunity of receiving approval at this time.

The important agricultural relief measures considered by the House and Senate at this session included the so-called equalization fee, the debenture plan, the allotment plan, and the emergency bill sponsored by Mr. RAINEY. The equalization fee, as you know, at one time passed the House and the Senate, but was vetoed by President Coolidge, and at that time it was generally understood that President Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, collaborated with Mr. Coolidge in preparing the veto message. The debenture plan, considered in both the House and the Senate for several years, was the subject of an attack made against it by President Hoover at the time of the adoption of the Federal Farm Board legislation.

The President in a letter to Senator MCNARY set forth 10 points upon which he based his opposition to the debenture plan. President Hoover has also gone on record in opposition to the so-called allotment plan, for in his message to Congress at the opening of the special session he registered his disapproval of the principle involved in this plan and likewise made known his opposition to all three plans—the equalization fee, the debenture, as well as the allotment plan. But now while we are considering the emergency bill introduced and sponsored by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], our majority leader, we are given to understand that this measure does not meet with presidential favor. The President's plan for the relief of agriculture, as indicated by the record, is the Federal Farm Board, which was passed in the very first session of Congress which assembled after his inauguration as President of the United States. This measure met with his approval. It was referred to as his handiwork, and its contribution to the relief of the stricken agriculturist of the country is too well known for comment at this time. Its passage was for the purpose of placing agriculture on a basis of economic equality, but by its record it has failed utterly. It was not wanted by the farmers at that time and it is not wanted by the farmers to-day.

The National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union, three representative and nationally known farm organizations, favor what is known as the 3-ply bill, a permissive measure which under certain conditions and regulations authorizes the application of the principle of the equalization fee, the debenture plan, and the allotment plan. Either all three of these plans or any one of them may be considered and put into operation as the conditions and the emergency require. It is a well-established fact that the President is opposed to the 3-ply bill. The Senate has already gone on record in opposition to this measure, and therefore under the circumstances it seems to me that the solution of the farm problem, like the solution of the prohibition question and the economic question, must await the coming of a sympathetic Congress and a President who can work in harness and in harmony. This teamwork in Government has been sorely missed for the past 8 or 10 years, and the failure of the administration to place agriculture on a reasonably sound basis has contributed in great measure to the widespread differences which exist in the legislative and executive branches of our Government. The Republican Party in the Senate and in the House have clashed violently over this question and from the record it may be assumed that teamwork and harmony necessary to aid agriculture can not be restored by that party.

Agriculture, a basic industry, demands the attention and the consideration of the Congress and the Executive, because and until agriculture is restored we can not hope to enjoy permanent prosperity in the United States. The restoration of the prosperity of agricultural Iowa, for example, is of far more importance than the restoration of our foreign trade with India, for it contributes more to our economic prosperity than any trade or commerce we have had with that British possession. The same is true of other agricultural States in relation to our trade with European and Asiatic countries. When the 48 States of the Union are prosperous we consume over 92 per cent of our production. To make America and American industries, to make our own people and our own States prosperous, to restore trade, buying power, and employment opportunities is our first and all-important task, and this can be brought about when leadership is restored to the country whose policies will command the cooperation of the Government and the people. The elimination of the Farm Board and of unfair tariff discriminations would, in my judgment, prove helpful to agriculture. But if we continue to pursue our present policies, then compensating legislation becomes inevitable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time, which I believe is five minutes, to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I believe a great deal of good has developed from this debate. I am very pleased that this very important subject has had these few minutes of consideration during the closing days of the session.

I think there is a good deal in the statement that this bill does not go far enough, that it is just a step in the right direction, but we have been trying here during all the time we have been in session to suggest something that would relieve the unemployment that exists in this country. I am frank to say to you, my friends, I do not believe we have done it. There are still millions of unemployed in the country, and we have not been able to help them as much as we would like.

I believe there are two ways by which we could help this situation: First, to shorten the hours of work and shorten the work week; and, second, to get these men in the cities back on small farms, just as this bill suggests.

I know it may sound foolish to you gentlemen who represent great farming areas where there are farms of 1,000 and 2,000 acres to talk about a 10 or 15 acre farm, but I was in Germany last summer and I saw thousands of these little farms of an acre or an acre and a half or 5 acres, with a man and his wife and four or five children living off of these farms. Of course, they say that this is peasant farming, and it is; but which is better—to let the men go back on small farms where they can at least raise a part of their living or let them remain in the cities starving or subject to the care and attention of the people of the community in which they live? They would not add appreciably to the surplus, as they would consume the greater part of what they would raise.

This bill does not go very far. It just takes a step in the right direction. I am in favor of going farther. Millions of men in the cities who are now idle came from the country, and they know how to make a living on the farm. They know how to raise a truck patch; and, if they do not, they have the Department of Agriculture, they have the county agents, and they have the men around them who can help them do it.

I submit there is a great deal of benefit to be obtained from the passage of this bill; and if we can encourage these thousands and millions of people in the city to go back on these farms and make a living, which I believe they can do during the summer, this will give us a chance to think about this matter, and then we can come back next winter with some definite and helpful plan. If necessary, we can enlist the aid of the Government and the States to get them back where they can be self-sustaining, where they can make a living, and where they can be independent, free American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as a relief measure, is comparable to the "bull" peddled on the floor of the House the other day by the two gentlemen from Kansas who are running for reelection.

It is a terrible situation when the House of Representatives, with all the misery and despair and unemployment existing throughout the land, in the closing days of the session—and I say "closing days" because the Democratic leadership of the House indicates it has practically finished its business and is ready to adjourn—we spend hours discussing an indefensible monstrosity such as this—a gesture, a promise.

Oh, my colleague from Wisconsin made his wonderful speech about the city unemployed milking the cow on the farm and raising crops if this bill passes. He well knows that in the State of Wisconsin the crops for this year have already been planted and many of them have been harvested. Where are you going to plant the seed this year? Out in the snow banks, where the snow in some parts of the country is 5 and 10 feet deep? Are you going to take these poor, unemployed city people, with their little children, and put them out on the farms where it is sometimes 22 degree below zero and where the snow is as high as 10 feet deep, and then say that you are saving them, that you are saving the little children, and that they can milk the good old cow that some one is to give them. If a neighbor gives them a cow, as the chairman of the Labor Committee and my colleague from Wisconsin intimated, what are they going to feed it? Snow from some of the snow banks 5 or 6 or 10 feet deep? I am surprised that my colleague from Milwaukee took the floor to-day and made the speech he did in favor of this bill, which does not even provide for the cow, chickens, seeds, and so forth, which the proponents promise to those in the cities who are in the bread lines.

If the proposition of returning the people from the city to the farm is sound, then let us have the intestinal stamina now to make appropriations so that when they get on the farms the men, women, and children will not suffer and starve.

The passage of this bill in its present form and the bull-fight debate on the floor of the House the other day will do more to bring the Congress of the United States into disrepute in these days of misery, distress, and despair than anything else. Instead of fiddling away the closing days of the session on this bill, why do not you Democrats, who control the House of Representatives, carry out your platform pledge and immediately modify the Volstead Act, and put hundreds of thousands of people to work throughout the country in the breweries, in the wineries, on the railroads, and in the coal mines, and so forth, and bring additional revenue into the badly battered Federal Treasury, and then, perhaps, you will have some money to take care of the suffering, unemployed veterans, who need their adjusted compensation and who made it possible for this Nation to be alive to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. I simply want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has been indulging the House day after day with "dumbagogic" statements that the bill is not a Democratic bill, that it came from Senator MCNARY. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution to provide information and direction to individuals and agencies concerned with relieving unemployment through finding opportunities for subsistence in rural areas.

Whereas under present conditions temporary relief for some of the unemployed may be provided by aiding them to obtain a subsistence in rural areas; and

Whereas the indiscriminate settlement of such families on land is likely to subject them to difficulties and disappointments, as well as impose burdens and hardships on rural communities through increasing agricultural surpluses and necessitating more ample provision for schools, roads, health, and other facilities; and

Whereas the likelihood of such disappointments and hardships may be minimized by information and assistance from the Department of Agriculture and other departments and agencies of the Federal Government, cooperating with State and local authorities: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to make available the services of the Department of Agriculture, cooperating with the Department of Labor, the Department of the Interior, the Federal Farm Board, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the President's Committee on the Unemployed, and other departments and agencies of the Government, in providing information to the several States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions of the States, and to individuals as to suitable opportunities and methods of aiding the unemployed to obtain a livelihood in rural communities, and in coordinating activities of State and local agencies working to that end.

For the purpose of better carrying out the objects of this resolution the Secretary of Agriculture, with such assistance as may be supplied by other Federal and State departments and agencies, is authorized and directed to encourage the formation of State organizations representing rural and urban interests through which organizations the Secretary may effectively work in coordinating the activities of urban agencies for unemployment relief with those of rural agencies in position to supply necessary information and direction for settlement of the unemployed.

The Secretary shall encourage urban relief organizations directly or through the aforesaid State organizations to make careful selection of those families whose experience and resources, as supplemented by such relief funds as may be available, fit them for earning a livelihood in the country.

The Secretary shall ascertain directly or through State and local agencies the available opportunities in rural areas for obtaining land and buildings suitable for occupancy by unemployed families, and the terms and conditions on which such land and buildings may be obtained.

The Secretary is also authorized and directed to cooperate with the aforementioned State and local agencies in formulating plans for placing unemployed on the land; and in making available the technical and extension facilities of the Department of Agriculture and of the State agricultural colleges and experiment stations in the selection of food crops and livestock for family use and for determining suitable facilities, methods, and practices.

The Secretary of Agriculture and such other Federal agencies as may cooperate with him are hereby authorized and directed—

(1) To carry out this resolution, as an emergency measure, with a view to placing unemployed persons in rural areas for obtaining a livelihood, but in such manner as will avoid so far as practicable expanding agricultural production.

(2) To discourage the transference of financial burdens in respect of unemployment relief from urban communities to rural communities.

(3) To prevent as far as possible the exploitation of the countryward movement.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 169, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BRUMM. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRUMM moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRUMM and Mr. SCHAFER) there were ayes 75 and noes 58.

Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. BLACK demanded tellers.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering tellers.

The question was taken; and 15 Members arose—not a sufficient number.

So the motion to recommit was agreed to.

THE RELIEF BILL

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill H. R. 9642, the relief bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I believe the Chair announced the last vote in error. I think the vote was 55 for the motion and 58 against.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The Chair counted and announced 75 ayes and 58 noes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I was under the belief that the gentleman from New York did not ask for the yeas and nays, believing that the motion to recommit had failed. Is there any opportunity for me to ask for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see any opportunity at this time except by unanimous consent. We have taken up a conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the conference report is offered for printing in the RECORD or is it called up?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents the report and calls it up for consideration.

Mr. SNELL. How does he get it before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the report states that the conferees have been unable to agree.

Mr. SNELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. This is the first experience the present occupant of the Chair has had in these matters. The Chair has taken the advice of the Parliamentarian, who has had some considerable experience concerning the rules of the House. The Chair thinks that where the conferees report that they have been unable to agree it is not necessary to act upon the conference report. The Chair is supported in that by a decision made by Mr. Speaker Reed, which may be found in Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, section 6562. Therefore, the Chair thinks that under these circumstances, where there is nothing in the conference report to agree to, the rule providing for printing in the RECORD would not apply and that the matter could be disposed of immediately after the reading of the report.

Mr. SNELL. I made the inquiry because I wanted to know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is telling the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I know; but the Chair did not propose to tell me before, and I thought I had the right to make the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not deprive the gentleman of any right. He gave him the reason. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. Do I understand the Chair to state there is no parliamentary way by which I can recur to that bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can move to reconsider, because no motion was made to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CONNERY. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. Just one moment. We have other business now before the House. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

J. W. COLLIER,
HENRY T. RAINEY,
R. L. DOUGHTON,
W. C. HAWLEY,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

PETER NORBECK,
SMITH W. BROOKHART,
P. L. GOLDSBOROUGH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 1 and insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 2, and upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. HAWLEY. May we know what these amendments are?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this report is a complete disagreement between the Senate and the House on the relief bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman moved to disagree to the two Senate amendments and we would like to know what they are.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is this. The Senate passed a House bill with two amendments. The House concurred in Senate amendment No. 1 with an amendment which substituted the provisions of the House relief bill in lieu of the Senate amendment; disagreed to Senate amendment No. 2 and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Last night the Senate agreed to the conference asked by the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has now submitted a conference report setting forth the fact that the conferees have been unable to agree. That report has just been read and the gentleman from Illinois now moves to further insist on the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1 and to insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 2.

The gentleman from Illinois has moved the previous question on his motion. It is a question of whether or not the House will insist upon its amendment to the Senate amendment. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to further insist on the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1 and to insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 2.

Mr. HAWLEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAPES. May I submit a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. If this motion prevails are we in any different position from what we were before the conferees reported?

The SPEAKER. If the House insists upon its amendment to the Senate amendment, the matter will go back to the Senate for such action as they want to take on the House amendment. The House acted upon this yesterday, insisting on the House amendment and asking a conference.

Mr. MAPES. We are sending the bill back to the conferees in the same shape that it was in when we sent it back yesterday, are we not, by this action?

The SPEAKER. This motion, if agreed to, will send the bill back to the Senate and will give the Senate another opportunity to consider the House amendment.

Mr. MAPES. And with the previous question ordered there is no opportunity to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. None whatever. The gentleman from Oregon demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 150, answered "present" 2, not voting 106, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

WHERE THE TAXPAYERS' MONEY GOES

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to voice my vigorous protest against the extravagant and wasteful practices of our Federal Government. Every dollar spent by the Government represents the coined sweat of labor, taken from the American public in the form of taxes. The American public are, therefore, entitled to a return in service of 100 cents on every dollar of tax money that is collected. Are they getting it? Let the record speak for itself:

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT COSTS INCREASE 6,600 PER CENT IN LAST 72 YEARS

Since 1860 the Republican Party has been in almost exclusive control of our National Government with only two brief exceptions. During those 72 years the costs of maintaining our Federal Government has increased from $63,000,000 in 1860 to over $4,000,000,000 per annum in 1932. During this same period the cost of government per person increased from $2 in 1860 to $38 in 1932, an increase of 1,900 per cent.

In 1911 our Government expenses were $726,424,850, whereas they had grown to $4,219,950,339 in 1931. This represents an increase of 467 per cent in 20 short years.

But the most remarkable feature of these past 20 years is the fact that while governmental costs were increasing 467 per cent our national wealth increased only 94 per cent, and our population only 34 per cent.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT COSTS INCREASE $650,000,000 UNDER COOLIDGE

During the six years of the Coolidge administration the American public were misled into the belief that the "efficiency and economy" which the Republican Party has been promising for half a century was actually being practiced. But while such economies as saving paper clips, tying broken rubber bands together, and writing on both sides of the paper were being followed, Mr. Coolidge officially recommended, allowed, and approved increases in the expenses of our National Government of more than $650,000,000.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT COSTS INCREASE ALMOST $3,000,000,000 UNDER HOOVER

But the Hoover administration capped the climax of the wildest orgy of spending this Nation or the world has ever seen. The first year of his administration showed an increase of $400,956,441 over Mr. Coolidge's last year, the second year showed an increase of $367,464,556 over Mr. Coolidge's last year, the third year an increase of $775,802,448.61, and the fourth year an increase of $1,363,570,526.83, making a grand total increase of $2,907,794,073.18.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN THE MIDST OF A DEPRESSION

During the Hoover administration, while the public at large was in the throes of the worst depression the country has ever seen, with poverty and unemployment prevalent on every side, and dispossessions, foreclosures, and tax sales the order of the day, the Federal Government at Washington was splurging and spending with a more reckless abandon than it had done even in boom times. Here is a bird's-eye view of the comparison in costs under Coolidge and Hoover:

Department	Coolidge, 1928	Hoover, 1932	Increase	Per cent increase
Department of Commerce	$36,821,839.14	$54,436,582.95	$17,614,743.81	48
Department of Justice	26,432,106.66	51,489,201.00	25,057,094.34	95
Department of Labor	10,160,396.00	15,565,450.00	5,405,054.00	53
Navy Department	320,465,998.47	358,269,823.63	37,793,825.16	11
War Department	370,429,310.67	445,910,938.02	75,481,627.35	24
Independent offices	520,040,576.30	1,318,962,723.58	798,921,967.28	150
Legislative establishment	16,479,576.56	28,786,036.94	12,306,460.38	89
Department of Agriculture	156,429,535.94	289,925,550.95	133,496,015.01	74
Executive office	438,460.00	474,880.00	36,420.00

SOME EXAMPLES OF "ECONOMY"

Let me cite a few illustrations of where the taxpayers' money is going:

First. Although the World War has been over 13 years, the Alien Property Custodian's Office is still flourishing with a personnel drawing good salaries.

Second. Although the World War has been over 13 years, the war-time United States Railway Administration is still functioning with offices and personnel absolutely oblivious of the fact that the war is over.

Third. Mr. Hoover, as Secretary of Commerce, secured the erection in Washington of a $17,500,000 building to house his department with 40 acres of floor space, 1,600 telephones, massive bronze doors, and a private elevator for the Secretary. This building cost more than the entire Louisiana Purchase—or about one-third of the total area of the United States, and was erected on a site valued at $30,000,000.

Fourth. A Memorial Bridge across the Potomac was built, with about 15 miles of highway, at a cost of $20,000,000, estimated at about $7 an inch.

Fifth. The Department of Agriculture Building was constructed at a cost of about $12,000,000 and boasts of Corinthian columns of white marble, an inner court, a fountain, and "taverine floors which will make even the clatter of hobnail boots sound like the soft tread of daintily slippered feet on velvet rugs."

Sixth. Embassies in foreign countries, to the tune of $10,000,000, in one appropriation bill, have been built, and one in Berlin has been purchased at a cost of $1,800,000.

Seventh. Five hundred million dollars of taxpayers' money has been dumped into the Farm Board to "stabilize" prices, which has failed to stabilize the price of a single commodity. Wheat, for instance, has dropped from $1.60 to 25 cents under their "stabilization" efforts.

Eighth. The pay roll of the Federal Farm Board shows: 1 employee at $20,000 per year, 7 at $12,000, 1 at $10,000, 1 at $9,000, 1 at $8,000, 2 at $7,500, 6 at $6,500, 6 at $6,000, 10 at $5,600, and so forth, to make a total of $968,780 in salaries alone per year. These salaries are being paid in the name of the farmers who can not pay their taxes and whose products are selling below the cost of production.

In addition, the Farm Board is financing cooperative associations, some of whose so-called experts draw salaries and bonuses of $50,000, and one as high as $75,000 per year.

Ninth. The army of Federal officeholders has increased from 568,715 in Mr. Coolidge's time to 732,560 in Mr. Hoover's time, an increase of 163,745, or about 30 per cent.

Tenth. A bill was passed a year ago authorizing the demolition of four splendid buildings in Washington because their architecture does not harmonize with certain other buildings in their vicinity, and providing for their reconstruction along architectural lines which do harmonize. The buildings to be destroyed are in excellent condition, would last indefinitely, and represent millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

To the foregoing could be added numerous other instances of flagrant extravagance, such as the countless subsidies under which more millions are given away under a thinly disguised veil, but the ones I have cited are sufficient to illustrate my point.

THE TIME FOR RETRENCHMENT IS HERE

The time has come when the public is beginning to realize that they can not support their Government in the style to which it has become accustomed during these past three Republican administrations. I appeal for a return to the common sense, rigid economy, and homely frugality of the founders of our Republic, for the discharge of the army of tax-eating experts and high-salaried officials and jobholders, for the abolition of useless bureaus, boards, and commissions, for the total elimination of all functions of government not absolutely essential, and for a drastic reduction in all governmental expenditures during this period of economic distress.

THE ONLY CURE FOR HIGH TAXES

There is no magic panacea for the relief of our tax-burdened people except to reduce taxes, and taxes can only be reduced by reducing the cost of government.

That the Hoover administration can not be trusted to reduce the cost of government has been amply demonstrated. If the burdened taxpayers are to get relief, it must come through a Democratic administration. In the present Congress the Democratic Party, in control of the House of Representatives, has demonstrated not only its desire but its ability to rise to the emergency, for appropriations for the fiscal year made by the Democratic House are more than $750,000,000 below those made for the fiscal year 1932 by the Republican Congress and approved by President Hoover. Moreover, the Democratic House actually reduced the 1932 appropriations by approximately $325,000,000 under the sum that President Hoover himself and his Budget Bureau recommended be appropriated.

The people of my State are vitally interested in the problem of reducing Federal Government costs, for they should remember that for every dollar of Federal tax money expended in New Jersey by the Federal Government for road construction and all other purposes the New Jersey taxpayers pay approximately $23 into the Federal Treasury.

THE VOLUNTARY DOMESTIC-ALLOTMENT PLAN OF FARM RELIEF

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, we are in a perplexing and sorrowful situation to-day. Farmers are producing more products of every sort than they can sell. We have railroads, ships, machinery, equipment of all sorts far in excess of what we are using. We have unemployed in our cities, and even encamped almost within the shadow of the Capitol, daily becoming more restive and more unhappy over the insufficient and unappetizing food, the tatters of clothing, the makeshift shelter, and the reproach of living on charity. We have farmers feverishly seeking to reduce costs and buying nothing so that their few dollars can cover even taxes and interest, and keep them from losing the savings of a lifetime, or accumulated from generations of hard work. Too many products, too much equipment, too many men! Surely something is wrong if we can not put land and labor and capital together to produce the necessities and even the luxuries of existence.

As is usual under such conditions, farmers are in the least protected position. The prices of the things they sell have declined to 60 per cent below what they were when the depression began. In fact, prices of farm products are now only 56 per cent of what they were even before the war. The prices of things farmers buy have declined much more slowly, and are now 112 per cent of the pre-war average. Each wagonload of products that the farmer sells will buy only half as much of the things he buys as it would before the war.

More serious still is the fact that many of the farmer's costs—taxes, interest on his mortgage, freight rates—have not declined at all. In many communities farmers' cash income has declined so sharply that they are unable to meet even these fixed expenditures, and as a consequence are forced to lose their farms or make a settlement with their creditors.

Looking backward we can begin to see the developments that brought the present catastrophe about, developments from which farmers were already suffering before the greater disaster of 1929 added to their woes.

The war, which reduced farm production in Europe, had stimulated food production elsewhere—in Canada, in Argentina, in Australia, as well as in the United States. For a short time after the war heavy new loans and paper inflation blinded men's eyes; in 1920 they began to face the task of reconstruction, and a sharp depression occurred, a depression which now seems short.

After the war European countries turned to rebuilding their shattered agriculture. By 1925 they were generally back to pre-war output. Production elsewhere did not decline as that in Europe increased, however. Once range land is plowed for wheat or cotton it is difficult to get it back into grass again, and what was true of our Great Plains was true of the new producing regions in other countries as well.

The increasing world supplies of farm products held prices of farm products below the prices of other products. Most European countries did not permit this to affect their producers and reduce their production, however. Instead, they took special measures by protective tariffs, import quotas, milling restrictions, and the like, to maintain prices to their farmers. From 1925 to 1930 prices of wheat at Liverpool fell from over $1.75 per bushel to 80 cents per bushel. In Italy, France, Germany, however, wheat prices were so maintained that they were kept up to about $1.50 to $1.75 during this whole period. Other countries took similar action, except England; and even England is now preparing to see that her wheat producers get about $1.50 per bushel.

The protected maintained prices in Europe held down consumption and increased acreage. Even in 1931 there was a significant increase in European wheat acreage. The entire present world surplus of wheat would not have accumulated had European producers reduced their acreages in response to the low prices from 1927 on instead of increasing them.

Already in 1928 and 1929 the prices of wheat, cotton, and other farm commodities were low as a result of these accumulating surpluses. Manufacturers, however, had waxed rich on goods sold to Europe on credit. In 1929 our stock-market boom, built on these profits, collapsed, and carried farm and industrial prices alike down with it.

We used to be a debtor nation, owing money to Europe. We had to export a surplus of goods to settle our interest account. The war made us a creditor nation. Our high tariffs prevented Europe from paying us in goods; we made great loans abroad to enable Europe to continue buying from us. The stock-market boom and then the depression cut off new loans; we raised our tariffs still higher, making it still more difficult for Europe to sell to us. Farmers felt the full effect. Without the foreign exchange to buy our wheat, cotton, pork, tobacco, and hampered by exchange regulations imposed in desperate attempts to keep their countries from going bankrupt, our foreign customers had to almost entirely stop buying either farm or industrial products from us. Farmers suffered directly from the two-thirds fall in the prices of export products, and indirectly from the resulting near stoppage in domestic business activity, and in the resulting one-half fall in the price of domestic products.

The poor economic condition of farmers has given rise to a continuous crop of farm-relief proposals. The first McNary-Haugen bill, in 1924, and the second, vetoed by President Coolidge, both attempted to raise the price of farm products in this country by dumping the surplus abroad. The export-debenture plan, more recently developed, would attempt the same thing through what is equivalent to a bounty on exports. None of these measures could work now, for practically every country has machinery developed and well oiled for slapping on new tariffs or other import restrictions on the slightest provocation; any outright attempt to dump our surplus products on world markets would lead to such a wave of foreign retaliation as shortly to completely nullify its effects.

In 1929 an agricultural marketing act was finally passed. In addition to the highly desirable support and encouragement this gave to cooperative marketing it directed the board to stabilize prices—by buying up the surpluses with Government money! Even though this was attempted only with wheat and cotton, the Farm Board found it impossible to stabilize these prices in the face of the world depression. Furthermore, it also found that even these low prices, plus well-intentioned but ineffective advice, could not check overproduction. Farmers continued to produce more than was consumed. In spite of two years of phenomenal drought, unsold surpluses continued to accumulate; and farmers, in their individual, uncoordinated production, were helpless to prevent it.

No one can question that our protective-tariff system has speeded the industrial development of the United States, has increased the number of workers in those plants and maintained their wages, and has enabled manufacturers to charge higher prices here than abroad and so has increased their profits and dividends. Similar beneficial results were secured in the case of some farm products. Sugar, wool, dairy products, mohair, beef cattle, flaxseed, all sold at prices above the world market, for a time at least; some of them are still selling above world prices.

On those farm products where we produced a surplus, however, the tariff could not be made effective. Wheat, cotton, hogs, tobacco, rice, all sold on a basis of world-market prices. As world economic conditions deteriorated, prices of these products shrank. In 1924 these export products yielded farmers over $4,200,000,000 of income, 37 per cent of the total. By 1930 their value had shrunk to $2,800,000,000, or 29 per cent of the total, and in 1931 to below $2,000,000,000, and to only a little more than a quarter of all cash income of farmers. Yet the acreage of exportable crops had increased from 1924 to 1931. If we are to restore the farmer's purchasing power, we must give him the same protection on the domestic consumption of his exportable products that we have long given to all the products of industry, for modern, large-scale organization enables industry to profit from a tariff, whether part of the product is exported or not. In fact, the Edge Act definitely exempts exporting combinations from the antitrust laws.

Everyone who has given any serious thought whatever to our agricultural problem concedes that if agriculture is to be placed on a parity with other industries it must be brought within the protective system. Furthermore, that to do this effectively there must be some control of production. All of the various plans which have been proposed—equalization fee, export debenture, compulsory allotment—have been based on the idea of making the tariff at least partially effective. All of them carry an implied recognition that there must be some control of production. Yet none of them provides any method by which this control can be effectively brought about. That is undoubtedly one of the great weaknesses in all plans heretofore proposed.

This general recognition that the farmer must be brought under the protective system and that there must be some control of production has already been expressed by both political parties this year.

The Republican Party, in its 1932 platform, has definitely pledged farmers that it will take steps to make the tariff effective on their products in the following language:

The party pledges itself to make such revision of tariff schedules as economic changes require to maintain the parity of protection to agriculture with other industry.

The Republican Party has also pledged itself to help farmers in controlling production, the provision of the platform relating to this reading as follows:

The fundamental problem of American agriculture is the control of production to such volume as will balance supply with demand. In the solution of this problem the cooperative organization of farmers to plan production, and the tariff to hold the home market for American farmers are vital elements. A third element, equally as vital, is the control of the acreage of land under cultivation, as an aid to the efforts of the farmer to balance production.

We will support any plan which will help to balance production against demand and thereby raise agricultural prices, provided it is economically sound and administratively workable without burdensome bureaucracy.

The Democratic platform does not expressly cover this question, but Governor Roosevelt, in his speech of acceptance, made the following statement:

Why, the practical way to help the farmer is by an arrangement that will, in addition to lightening some of the impoverishing burdens from his back, do something toward the reduction of the surpluses of staple commodities that hang on the market. It should be our aim to add to the world prices of staple products the amount of a reasonable tariff protection, give agriculture the same protection that industry has to-day.

And in exchange for this immediately increased return I am sure that the farmers of this Nation would agree ultimately to such planning of their production as would reduce the surpluses and make it unnecessary in later years to depend on dumping those surpluses abroad in order to support domestic prices. That result has been accomplished in other nations; why not in America, too?

It is encouraging indeed to find that not only agricultural economists and farm leaders are in agreement on this question but that political leaders have fallen in line as well. With such a general recognition of the essential nature of the problem and the remedy, the practical question is, What plan, if any, can be worked out which will put those principles and policies into effect? Fortunately, there is such a plan already in existence. One which in every essential is in harmony with the policy stated in the Republican platform and by Governor Roosevelt. It is known as the voluntary domestic allotment plan.

This plan has been developed quietly by serious and nonpolitical economic students of the farm problem. Originally proposed by the late Walter J. Spillman, formerly chief of the office of farm management of the United States Department of Agriculture, the plan has undergone successive modifications at the hands of John D. Black, professor of agricultural economics at the University of Minnesota and subsequently at Harvard, and of M. L. Wilson, head of the department of agricultural economics of the Montana State College, and by a committee with whom he has been working. It has attracted considerable support in the Northwest and has been indorsed by the Montana State Farm Bureau, but it has been so recently developed in its final form that it could not be discussed at the conventions of the national farm organizations held last fall and winter. I am informed, however, that its principles have been approved by farm leaders, cooperative associations, labor groups, and even business interests which are dependent upon the welfare of farmers.

I have been interested in the theory of this plan for several years, but it had not been worked out in practical legislative form until Professor Wilson and his committee gave it their study and attention. The plan in essentially its present form has been presented to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, where it aroused great interest.

In my opinion, the outstanding advantages of the voluntary domestic-allotment plan are as follows:

First. Tariff protection is made effective on the domestic consumption of products of which there is an exportable surplus.

Second. Incomes of farmers are definitely increased, yet there is no stimulus to increased production.

Third. A definite method is provided for farmers to control production, and to reduce it where necessary, just as big corporations have always done.

Fourth. No export dumping is involved; hence there is no danger of reprisals or retaliation by foreign governments.

Fifth. No price fixing is involved, and there is no interference with present marketing agencies.

Sixth. Consumers are protected, since the special methods provided are not to be used to raise prices of any product above its pre-war purchasing power.

Seventh. There is no compulsion on any individual farmer to join in the plan; those who elect not to share in the benefits are free to produce as much as they please.

Eighth. No new Government appropriation is required, and there is no additional expense to the Treasury.

Ninth. There is no dictation from Washington; instead, administration is decentralized through State, county, and township committees, composed of local representatives.

In addition to these benefits, the plan provides a practical way by which a large volume of new credit would be put into the hands of farmers. This would not only make further seed loans and other special financing unnecessary but would tend to check deflation. Together with the public works, productive credit, and relief measures which have been suggested in other proposals, it should help to start an increase in credit in use throughout the country and to start the recovery from the long depression.

The several elements of the proposal may be briefly outlined as follows:

COMMODITIES TO WHICH APPLICABLE

The plan applies to those commodities in which there is an exportable surplus, i. e., a production in excess of domestic consumption, and in which prices are below cost of production. Wheat, cotton, tobacco, rice, and hogs are specifically included; other products may be included following recommendations from the Farm Board to Congress for approval of rates of levy for "tariff adjustment charges."

COLLECTION OF "TARIFF-ADJUSTMENT CHARGES"

The Farm Board is authorized to levy a "tariff-adjustment charge" upon each unit of each specified commodity processed, manufactured, or distributed for domestic consumption, to be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue from the processor, manufacturer, or distributor at some point in the marketing process to be designated by the board. The charges are not to exceed 42 cents per bushel on wheat, 5 cents per pound on cotton, 5 cents per pound on tobacco—or equivalent charges on finished products—one-half cent per pound on rough rice, or 2 cents per pound on live hogs. Portions of the commodity consumed by the producer or used for the production of articles for export are exempt from tax, and portions used for low-order domestic uses may be wholly or partially exempt. Funds so collected are to be paid into a special "domestic-allotment account" in the Treasury, and to be recorded separately for each commodity.

VOTING BY PRODUCERS

The Farm Board is authorized to conduct national votes of producers of each product, to determine (1) whether they wish the board to put the plan into operation for their product, (2) whether they are willing to cooperate with the board in putting it into effect, and (3) whether they wish the board to require producers who receive "tariff benefits" to reduce their acreage or production; and if so, by how large a percentage? Votes as to desired amount of reduction may be held each year.

PAYMENT OF "TARIFF BENEFITS" TO PRODUCERS

The funds derived from the tariff-adjustment charges on each commodity are made available for paying tariff benefits to the producers of that commodity. These benefits are to be paid to producers, at the rate of so much per bushel or per pound on the domestic allotment of each producer, according to the net yield of the tariff adjustment charge. The allotment of the domestic consumption to each producer for this purpose will be worked out by State, county, and township committees cooperating with the board, and will be based upon previous acreages and average yields.

ALLOTMENT CONTRACT WITH PRODUCERS

Allotments will be made only to those producers who in return will sign a contract not to increase acreage, or to reduce acreage if the board decides that a reduction is desirable, after considering both economic prospects and the vote of the producers of the product. It will not be a violation of the contract, however, for a farmer to increase his acreage if he arranges with some other farmer to reduce his acreage by an equal amount below the amount specified in his contract. However, the matter of reduction of acreage and amount of such reduction would be subject to a vote of the producers as described above.

The tariff benefits will be paid from the domestic-allotment account to individual producers in annual payments at the end of the marketing year through the State and county committees. On rented farms the checks will be drawn jointly to the owner and tenant. As soon as the allotment contracts are signed, banks and credit corporations can lend farmers up to 90 per cent of the probable amount of their benefit payments for the current crop year. The board will announce the probable payment to be made per bushel or pound to determine these loan values. Producers' notes secured by such contracts will be eligible for rediscount by Federal reserve banks.

FREEDOM OF INDIVIDUAL FARMERS

Each farmer has full liberty to decide whether he wishes to participate in the plan, regardless of whether he has voted or how he has voted. If he accepts the tariff-benefit payment, he agrees to control his production in accordance with the wishes of the majority of producers; if he would rather increase his production, he loses his right to share in the tariff-benefit payments.

READJUSTMENTS OF ALLOTMENTS

Whenever a farm is sold or rented to a new tenant, the allotment right goes with the land, rather than with the man. Once every five years, however, allotments will be redetermined on the basis of the past five years' acreage and production.

PUBLICITY OF ALLOTMENTS

In prorating the domestic allotments in any county to the farmers of that county, the county and township committees will be guided by sworn statements of individual farmers, made on their ballots and on additional reports. These individual reports will be published in full in the local papers, and any individual will be free to question the accuracy of any farmer's report. This "honor system" of reporting, with publication and investigation of informal complaints as a check, has worked well in local assessment in many counties, and will simplify the task of the local allotment committees.

UNCLAIMED BENEFITS

Allotment benefits which are not claimed by farmers who prefer not to sign the contracts will remain in the allotment fund until a reserve has been accumulated, and then will revert to the general receipts of the Treasury.

INDIVIDUAL FARM ILLUSTRATION

The way in which the plan would work may be illustrated in the case of an individual wheat grower whose 1932 crop is now in the ground. Take a man whose average acreage for the last five years has been 100 acres, and whose average yield was 20 bushels an acre. His base production would then be 2,000 bushels. If the domestic allotment to his county was equal to 75 per cent of the base production for all the farmers in that county, this farmer would then receive an allotment of 1,500 bushels as the amount upon which he would receive payment of tariff benefits. He would sign a contract with the county committee that he would not plant more than 100 acres the next year or that he would reduce his acreage—up to 10 per cent reduction—if a general reduction were decided upon. As soon as the contracts were signed he could take his copy to the bank and borrow up to 90 per cent of its probable value upon it, or about $560. As soon as his 1932 crop was ripe he would harvest it and sell it in the usual way to his local elevator, receiving payment in full at the prevailing price, based upon the world market just as it is now. Then at the end of the season—about July, 1933—the local allotment committee would certify that he had kept his contract by not planting a larger acreage for harvest in 1933 than the 100 acres specified, and the farmer then would receive by a check the full payment of his tariff benefits on the 1932 crop. If these came to 40 cents a bushel, that would be $600 coming in at the end of the marketing year. If he had borrowed on his contract, the check would go first to the bank and he would receive the balance above the loan advance.

If a 5 per cent reduction in acreage had been decided upon for 1933, our farmer would be so notified by the local committee, and he would have to show them that he had planted no more than 95 acres for the new crop before his allotment would be paid.

Or, if with the 100-acre limit, our farmer wanted to grow 150 acres of wheat in 1933, he would have two alternatives: Either he could withdraw from the plan and lose his right to receive benefit payments for the year, or he could arrange with some other farmer to plant 50 acres less than the amount specified in this second farmer's contract and to transfer the right to plant the balance to the first farmer. In the latter case he would not lose his right to the benefit payment, since his action would not be increasing acreage above the total on which the board was planning.

Assuming that wheat sells at 40 cents a bushel at the farm in 1932, our farmer's income on a crop of 2,000 bushels would work out as follows:

Income without the plan in operation: 2,000 bushels at $0.40	$800
Income with the plan in operation:
2,000 bushels at $0.40	800
Tariff benefits on 1,500 bushels	600
Total wheat income	1,400

The amount of the benefit payment would be the same no matter whether the farmer had a crop failure or a bumper yield. If he had a bad year and produced only 800 bushels on his 100 acres, he would still get the benefit payment of 1,500 bushels, which would provide a form of crop insurance, while if he had a bumper crop and had 3,000 bushels to sell, the benefit payments would still be just the same, on 1,500 bushels.

Since wheat prices would still be left undisturbed at the world level, use of wheat for feeding chickens, hogs, and other livestock would not be interfered with. The surplus would not be increased as it would if wheat prices were raised too high for feed use, as they might be under some of the other plans which have been proposed.

On cotton, tobacco, and rice the plan would work much as has been outlined here for wheat, except that the domestic allotments on tobacco might be worked out separately on Burley, dark-fired, and so forth, so as to adjust the production of each to its own demand. When the plan was applied to hogs it might be necessary to control corn acreage as well as production or sales of hogs, so as to prevent the reduction in hog surpluses from leading to a new surplus of beef or lambs. Such questions would be worked out as the proposal was developed in operation.

PLAN MOST FEASIBLE YET PROPOSED

Taken as a whole, the plan has three parts: The collection of tariff-adjustment charges, the payment of tariff benefits to producers in proportion to their domestic allotments, and the control or reduction of production through the contracts with producers. It is the most comprehensive and most feasible plan which has yet been presented for improving the position of the farmer. It meets all the practical objections which have been made against former plans. It has won the approval of all groups—farmers, laborers, business men—as soon as it was explained to them. It secures the results aimed at by the other farm relief bills without the serious difficulties inherent in them.

BURDEN OF THE TARIFF-ADJUSTMENT CHARGE

The tariff-adjustment charges, collected from the processor or manufacturer, would mostly either be absorbed by them or by other concerns in the process of distribution or be passed on to the consumer. In some products, such as tobacco, where the cost of the raw material makes only an insignificant part of the retail price of the finished product and where manufacturers' profits have been large, the charge might be largely absorbed by the manufacturer with little difficulty. In other products most of the charge might be passed on to the consumer; but the farmer now receives such a small part of the retail price that even if all the charge was passed on there would be little extra burden upon consumers. In the case of wheat, for example, the farmer is now receiving about three-fourths cent out of the 7-cent average retail price of a pound loaf; in cotton goods the cost of the raw material is only a small fraction of the retail price, perhaps only 5 to 10 per cent; in rice the farmer receives about 23 cents out of each dollar spent by the consumer; while with hogs the farmer receives about 25 cents from each dollar the consumer pays for pork and lard. Even if all the cost were passed on, an increase of 50 per cent in the returns to the producer would increase retail meat prices by not over 12½ per cent—and not all the cost would be passed on.

In some products, especially hogs, the higher retail price might have a slight tendency to reduce consumption and cause increased exports. Any harmful effects of this on world market prices would be prevented in either of two ways: (a) By reductions in production in the following year, which would compensate for the effect of the modest price advance on consumption; and (b) by minor stabilization purchases by the Farm Board, to be held off the market until those reductions in production had become effective. In this way the plan would absolutely prevent export dumping and the demoralized world prices and foreign retaliation which would go with dumping, and instead would help stabilize world markets as well as our own.

The stabilization operations which the Farm Board was directed to use by the agricultural marketing act were doomed to eventual failure, for that act did not provide any effective device for controlling production. This new plan provides the necessary arrangements by which production can be controlled. With definite ability to control subsequent production, the Farm Board could then safely go ahead and make minor stabilization purchases when needed in especial circumstances, knowing that production in subsequent years would be reduced to an extent that would enable the board to dispose of its purchases without loss. Even under conditions of continuously deteriorating world economic conditions, the course of our wheat prices for the 1931–32 crop season has shown that prices will not fail to stabilize when increases in supplies are checked. The slight improvement in the relative position of wheat is due largely to poor crop-growing conditions; under the proposed plan similar price improvements can be brought about through the deliberate control of production.

Under the plan as proposed there is little or no opportunity for the tariff-adjustment charge to be taken out of the producer instead of being paid by middlemen and consumers. The price paid to the producer remains the world-market price, just as it is now; the charge could be passed back to the producer only by beating down the world-market price. The provisions for controlling production and for minor stabilization purchases where temporarily necessary would effectively prevent this; the effect of the plan would be to give producers a pre-war purchasing power for that part of their production needed for the domestic market.

At the same time, the provision limiting the extent to which prices may be raised automatically prevents farmers from using this new power to extort an undue advantage from other groups. They may raise the prices of their products to a normal exchange relationship with other products, but no higher. Incidentally, it should be noted that this is granting farmers far less advantage than other groups have enjoyed in the past. Tariff measures or other devices to help particular groups have never carried any automatic provision to protect consumers from extortionate prices. This proposal will give farmers their fair income, but no more, which is all that any farmer has ever asked.

PROBABLE NET BENEFITS TO PRODUCERS

As has already been indicated, the payment of tariff benefits would be only a small part of the advantages to be derived from this plan; the control of production and the elimination of depressing surpluses would be even more important in the long run. However, some idea of the immediate effect which the plan would have on farmers' incomes may be obtained by working out what the collections from the tariff adjustment charges would be. Since consumption of cotton, tobacco, and other products is now low because of the depression, these estimates have been prepared as maxima and minima; the former based on normal consumption and the latter upon consumption under the present depressed conditions. All these estimates are based upon the consumption on which tariff-adjustment charges would probably be paid, leaving out quantities used for seed, feed, home-farm consumption, and export, which would pay no charge.

Estimated tariff-benefit payments

To producers of—	Minimum	Maximum
	Million dollars	Million dollars
Wheat	180	200
Cotton	115	160
Tobacco	35	45
Rice	5	6
Hogs (and beef, through competition)	300	400
Total	635	811

The producers of these five products received under $2,000,000,000 from their 1931 production, and will receive still less in 1932 unless some aid is provided. It is evident that the immediate increased income which might be obtained for farmers through this plan would be of material assistance in helping them through the depression, and in improving as well the financial position of banks, insurance companies, local governments, local business men, and all those whose welfare is intimately tied up with the welfare of farmers. The provision for bank loans on allotment contracts would enable farmers to receive much of this increased income at once, long before most of the tariff-adjustment charges had been collected.

CONTROL OF PRODUCTION

The long-time advantages of this plan are even more important than the short-time advantages. The plan provides for the first time a definite method by which farmers can decide to restrict or to reduce production, and make that decision effective. Ordinarily, when farmers agree to reduce production, those who keep their word suffer from their smaller volume, whereas those who fail to reduce or who increase reap all the benefits. Under this plan that is no longer true; the men who control their production share in the tariff-benefit payments, while the men who increase production receive only the export price. The plan therefore provides an effective and yet a democratic method by which production can be reduced and agricultural surpluses can be controlled. Even if the plan did not provide any immediate cash benefits at all, this feature alone would improve the position of farmers in the long run.

There are over 6,000,000 farmers; their lack of any organization to plan production has resulted so far in ruthless competition among them, in overproduction, and in demoralized prices. This plan provides a means through which farmers can cooperate in planning production, just as they are already authorized to cooperate in marketing. It is not in any sense a socialistic step. The steel industry, the aluminum industry, the copper industry, and many others have long controlled their production through their large corporate organizations. The farmers alone have been unable to control their own operations. This plan provides a mechanism through which farmers can secure for themselves some of the same advantages which the planning and control of production have given to other producers under our present capitalistic institutions.

Compare the voluntary-allotment proposal with the other plans for farm relief which are before us. The export-debenture plan would create a pipe-line, of unknown dimensions, away from the United States Treasury; it might wipe out the entire income from import duties. The equalization-fee plan is similar in that it provides for dumping the surplus abroad. Our own tariff act has provisions directed against export dumping on our shores by foreign countries; they would be equally swift to retaliate against such actions by us. Both plans would involve us in endless difficulties with foreign governments; and higher tariffs, import quotas, and milling restrictions would soon be so raised against us that our whole export market would be gone and no net gain would be left to farmers.

The voluntary-allotment plan differs from all others so far proposed, first, because it is self-supporting and requires no new funds from the Public Treasury. Second, it involves no export dumping and offers no reason for foreign countries to close world markets against us. Third, it does not involve price fixing but leaves our present markets free to function in both domestic and export trade. Finally, it provides a definite check on overproduction, and puts into the hands of farmers themselves a mechanism through which they can once more bring their production into sound economic adjustment with the demands of consumers.

In the discussion of the mechanics of this plan the Farm Board has been considered as the administrative agency. As a matter of fact, very little centralized administration will be necessary. Should the Farm Board be abolished, the plan could very readily be administered by the Department of Agriculture or a board composed of three Cabinet officers.

Farm relief bills have been before this House for a dozen years. All of them had some merit; all had their defects. An agricultural marketing act was passed, with stabilization features which were impracticable, because it did not control production. Now, for the first time, a plan has been developed which is sound and well thought out; the problems which will arise in administration have been recognized and provided for; the shortcomings of the other proposals have been faced and conquered. It has all the advantages of the other plans and none of their weaknesses.

The provisions of this plan have been incorporated in the bill H. R. 12918, which I introduced on July 7; a modification of the plan is contained in H. R. 12919, introduced on the same day. It is to be regretted that the adjournment of Congress will prevent action on either of these measures at the present time. Never more than now have the distressed farmers of this country needed the benefits which will certainly flow from the enactment of this plan.

I realize that the present legislative situation prevents action at this time. It is my hope, however, that in the time intervening before the next session this plan will receive the careful study that it deserves from all who are interested in the permanent rehabilitation of agriculture and that when Congress convenes in December it may be speedily enacted into law.

THE DEVASTATING WORLD DEPRESSION AFFECTS GOVERNMENT FINANCES—REPUBLICAN LEADERSHIP AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS IN FINANCIAL MATTERS—THE FAILURE OF THE DEMOCRATIC HOUSE

THE DUTY OF CITIZENSHIP

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the prolongation of the business depression which for more than three years has continued to distress the entire civilized world has caused the people of all responsible nations to take an unusually active and vital interest in the issue of public expenditures and the cost of government of all kinds from the smallest local unit to the highest centralized authority. An intelligent consideration of the question with due attention to the facts and to the records of public men is needed in place of hysterical condemnation of those who are charged with the management of government simply because they now happen to have the responsibility of administering public office. More than ever the records of men and parties need to be studied with the sane purpose of selecting for public trust the party and men whose record and experience are such as to merit reposing in them the conduct of public matters during this critical stage of our national history. Such a discrimination is the first duty of good citizenship.

The record made by the Republican Party at this session in control of the Presidency and the Senate, compared with the efforts of the House of Representatives under control of the Democratic Party, presents a parallel which no thoughtful citizen can afford to ignore.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THIS SESSION

The total amount appropriated at this session of Congress, which convened in December last, comprises amounts both for completing the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and for providing funds for the entire period of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933. The total amount appropriated at this session is not the measure of the charge against the Treasury for any single year but should be considered and divided into the amounts that are assignable to the respective fiscal years for which appropriated.

The total amount for the session for both the fiscal years 1932 and 1933, together with scattered amounts for prior years and for judgments and claims, after excluding the postal revenues and the estimated savings under the economy act, is $4,870,558,830.72, the approximate amount chargeable against ordinary revenues. This amount is distributable among fiscal years as follows:

Fiscal year 1933	$3,886,192,479.24
Fiscal year 1932	977,035,786.11
Fiscal year 1931	713,591.57
Judgments and audited claims	6,616,973.80
	4,870,558,830.72

A table exhibiting the acts by which this total amount is granted will be appended to this statement as Table C.

The amount of $977,035,786.11 appropriated at this session for the fiscal year 1932, when added to the amounts appropriated at the last session for that fiscal year, including the revised permanent appropriations, brings the total for 1932 up to $5,026,046,098.18, the net appropriations for 1932 after excluding the portion of such appropriations chargeable to postal revenues.

The total appropriations at this session for the fiscal year 1933, after deducting therefrom the portion chargeable against the postal revenues and the estimated savings under the economy act, leave a net amount of $3,886,192,479.24 as a charge against ordinary revenues, or a decrease under the total for the fiscal year 1932 of $1,139,853,618.94.

The totals for the fiscal years 1932 and 1933 in comparative form will be found in Table A.

The net decrease of approximately $1,140,000,000 in the appropriations for 1933 under those for 1932 involves several items of unusual magnitude which are apart from the regular character of Government expenses, namely, $100,000,000 for the final installment of the revolving fund for the Federal Farm Board, $500,000,000 for the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $125,000,000 for the purchase of additional capital for the Federal land banks, and $200,000,000 for the making of loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates. These sums were all especially appropriated on account of the fiscal year 1932. Included in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 is the unusual sum of $322,224,000 for public works contained in the emergency relief and construction act of 1932 and an increase of approximately $120,000,000 in the funds for interest and retirement of the public debt. Apart from these extraordinary items in 1932 and 1933, there is a net decrease in all other appropriations, including the estimated saving of $150,000,000 under the economy act, of slightly more than $650,000,000.

The appropriation of $3,886,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933 contains a special amount of $322,224,000 for Government public-works projects under the emergency relief and construction act of 1932. This amount was included in spite of the objections of the President to its insertion. It was brought forward after the enactment of the new revenue law, was not considered or contemplated in the estimate of receipts in framing that act, and disturbs the careful planning for the balancing of the Budget. The President accepted it in securing the sound features of the relief legislation for which he had contended.

DECREASES IN BUDGET ESTIMATES

The Budget estimates submitted to Congress by the Executive during the session for the regular annual and deficiency bills have been reduced in the aggregate by $184,294,094.18. The savings estimated to be accomplished by the economy act through the impounding of appropriations and the economies to be effected in the appropriations already made total $150,000,000. Add this sum to the foregoing reduction and there is a total reduction in Budget estimate figures of $334,294,094.18.

Of the $184,000,000 decrease in estimates of appropriations, the major reductions that are open to question as to their ultimate effectiveness are the sums of $10,000,000 and $9,000,000, respectively, cut from the amounts for Federal-aid highways in the first deficiency and agricultural appropriation bills and the reduction of $50,000,000 in the item for the adjusted-service certificate fund under the Veterans' Administration for the making of loans to veterans on their certificates.

Since the establishment of the Budget system, 11 sets of estimates have been transmitted. Congress has effected a net reduction in each of these years, with the exception of one (1930), where there was a slight increase. The amounts of the reductions are as follows:

Fiscal year 1923 and prior years (67th Cong., 1st and 2d sess.)	$312,361,792.27
Fiscal year 1924 and prior years (67th Cong., 3d and 4th sess.)	10,741,504.15
Fiscal year 1925 and prior years (68th Cong., 1st sess.)	9,024,637.08
Fiscal year 1926 and prior years (68th Cong., 2d sess.)	12,596,495.90
Fiscal year 1927 and prior years (69th Cong., 1st sess.)	6,716,064.34
Fiscal year 1928 and prior years (69th Cong., 2d sess.)	7,752,939.03
Fiscal year 1929 and prior years (70th Cong., 1st sess.)	9,139,989.51
Fiscal year 1930 and prior years (70th Cong., 2d sess.)	[1] 8,142,294.71
Fiscal year 1931 and prior years (71st Cong., 1st and 2d sess.)	25,155,353.30
Fiscal year 1932 and prior years (71st Cong., 3d sess.)	29,368,255.39
Fiscal year 1933 and prior years (72d Cong., 1st sess.)	[2] 334,294,094.18

DEMOCRATIC RELIEF PROPOSALS

The Democratic House has on the one hand professed economy and on the other passed the authorization of enormous appropriations. The Garner public works relief bill contained items for public works on roads, rivers and harbors, flood control, and public buildings that would call for the direct expenditure of nearly $1,200,000,000 on Government projects. The Patman bill for the immediate full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans and the issuance of fiat money would have cost $2,500,000,000. The bill for the payment of certain benefits to beneficiaries of World War veterans would have taken $30,000,000 the first year, with an increasing cost in succeeding years. All of these bills passed the House but failed in the Senate. They total $3,730,000,000.

The Garner relief bill has been characterized as a "pork-barrel" measure. Among other propositions, it contained authorizations for public buildings in towns with postal receipts as low as $8,000 and $10,000 a year, and in such villages proposed to erect Government structures costing as much as $35,000 to $50,000, exclusive of the site. This bill for $1,200,000,000 upon public works during the next fiscal year, and a consequent increase of that amount in public expenditures, does not harmonize with the preconvention declaration of its sponsor that the cost of government of all kinds in the United States should be reduced at least one-third. It is also in conflict with the recent declaration of the Democratic platform demanding a drastic reduction in government expense and fixing 25 per cent as the measure of "drastic."

HOUSE EMASCULATION OF ECONOMY BILL

The economy bill, as reported to the House, carried provisions which would have resulted in savings approximating $200,000,000 a year. Its carefully worked-out proposals were emasculated by the House until as passed it was estimated to save little more than $40,000,000. The Senate repaired the destruction and rewrote the bill in such form that as finally accepted by the House and signed by the President it is conservatively calculated to reduce expenses during the fiscal year 1933 in the amount of $150,000,000.

SENATE REDUCTIONS IN SUPPLY BILLS

The total amount of the annual supply bills and the deficiency bills as they passed the House was $3,315,412,410.40. As these bills passed the Senate, they aggregated $3,292,907,536.20, a decrease by the Senate of $22,504,874.20 under the total of the same bills as they had passed the House.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM FOR SOUND RELIEF

Contrasted to the wasteful Democratic relief proposals for the expenditure of vast amounts upon nonproductive Government public works, some of which are not needed at any time and the rest of which should be postponed until we can afford them, is the emergency bill insisted upon by President Hoover to confine relief to loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bill as finally approved by the President is a constructive, businesslike measure, devoid of political "pork-barrel" projects. Its chief features are as follows:

First. Loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the States, not to exceed $300,000,000 in all, for the relief of distress. The loans to be made only after a showing that other resources are inadequate to meet the relief needs.

Second. Loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not to exceed $1,500,000,000 in the aggregate, for self-liquidating projects of a public character on terms which will provide for repayments of the loans.

Third. The broadening of the powers of the corporation in the character of loans it may make in order to assist agriculture.

Fourth. The inclusion of appropriations totaling $322,224,000 for the prosecution out of the Federal Treasury of work on roads, rivers, harbors, and other Government construction heretofore approved by Congress. Aside from the sum of $136,000,000 for roads and trails, the remainder of $186,224,000 is not to be expended if the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that the money is not available and can not be obtained upon reasonable terms.

As a result of the determined opposition of the President and the Senate to the extravagant and unsound relief proposals of the House the expenditures from ordinary receipts for relief purposes by this measure have been confined to the $136,000,000 plus so much of the $186,000,000 as money can be provided for instead of the $1,200,000,000 of direct expenditures as proposed by the Garner bill.

Fortunately, this sum of $322,224,000, with the exception of $136,000,000 for the construction of Federal-aid and other roads and trails, contains a provision that it shall not be expended if the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that money is not available and can not be obtained upon reasonable terms. These Government projects should not be allowed to unbalance the Budget, and the insistence by the President that this appropriation should contain a saving clause to avoid borrowing money and incurring a deficit for public works which can well await more propitious times is but another evidence of his determination to avoid unsound methods in furnishing relief.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION AUTHORITY

Great credit is due the President for the leadership he has exercised in the endeavors to decrease Federal expenditures, balance the Budget, and secure a sound relief proposal for the benefit of the country. Without his wise judgment and courage chaos would have reigned. From the beginning of the present session he has insisted upon reduced expenses, increased revenue to balance the Budget, sane relief measures devoid of "pork-barrel" projects, and the enactment of legislation giving him the authority to reorganize the executive departments and establishments with a view to eliminating duplication and overlapping and abolishing useless commissions and activities.

It is to be regretted that Congress did not respond earlier in the session to his request for this important reorganization authority. He had urged it countless times in his messages and otherwise. Only by the passage of the economy act on June 30, 1932, was the legislation finally given him to undertake the problem. It is an enormous and thankless task, but of great importance to the country. Powerful pressure will be exerted against certain of the consolidations and strong effort will be made to undertake some which should not be embarked upon. The long experience of President Hoover—first as a business man and relief executive, next as Cabinet officer, and finally as Chief Executive—splendidly equips him to carry out the greatest peace-time reorganization effort of any government.

[2] This sum includes $150,000,000 estimated saving on account of the economy act.

THE NEW REVENUE LAW

His insistence upon an adequate revenue measure to balance the Budget and uphold public credit finally was sustained by the action of the Senate in shaping the bill to amend the failure of the House. The fiasco of House leadership on this important bill for raising revenue, the most sacred of all privileges and duties of the House, will long be a dark page in the annals of revenue legislation.

THE 1933 TOTAL SUBDIVIDED

The appropriations for the fiscal year 1933, as heretofore stated, amounted to $3,886,000,000, and this sum includes the special appropriation for Government public-works projects in the emergency relief and construction act of 1932.

Many will desire to know how the total of $3,886,000,000 for 1933 is apportioned. The following table shows in a general summary way the total by large groupings of items. Roughly, the sum of $1,130,000,000 is for interest and public debt-retirement funds; $1,000,000,000 for veterans, including trust funds; $600,000,000 for the Army and Navy; $322,000,000 is for Federal Government public works in the relief bill; and approximately $1,000,000,000 is for all other expenses and activities of government:

Veterans of all wars	$928,000,000
Interest on the public debt	640,000,000
Public debt-retirement funds	479,000,000
Postal deficit payable from the general fund (estimated)	81,000,000
Navy	319,000,000
Army	289,000,000
Federal-aid roads and trails	109,000,000
Public-buildings construction	108,000,000
Rivers and harbors, flood control, Panama and other canals	112,000,000
Trust funds	118,000,000
Emergency relief and construction act of 1932 for Federal Government construction on roads, rivers and harbors, public buildings, etc., for relief of unemployment, etc	322,000,000
All other activities and expenses of government, including the 10 departments, the judiciary, and Congress	513,000,000
	4,036,000,000
Deduct estimated savings under the economy act to be distributed over the foregoing totals, which the provisions of such act will operate to reduce	150,000,000

THE 25 PER CENT REDUCTION PLANK?

The pledge of the Democratic platform for a decrease of 25 per cent in Government expenditures means a cut of one-fourth in the total. There is nothing equivocal about the promise. It is clear and absolute. A decrease of 25 per cent in the total of $3,886,000,000, which I have just set forth, would be approximately $1,000,000,000. It will be interesting to learn from which items it is proposed to take this billion, particularly when over $2,100,000,000 of the total is for public-debt items and veterans, $600,000,000 for the Army and Navy, $322,000,000 for special public-works relief, and $1,000,000,000 for all else. The rash promises of the Democratic Party of the liberal reductions it will make are not in keeping with its economy record at this session.

THE FINANCIAL RECORD OF DEMOCRACY

The capacity of parties for government must not be gauged by promises alone. The record of management when in power is the better criterion in passing judgment. The Democratic Party was last in control on March 4, 1921. A Republican Congress had come into power in March 4, 1919, as a result of the elections of the fall of 1918. President Wilson called the new Congress into extra session in May, 1919. Upon assembling, it was confronted with the duty of passing, before the commencement of the fiscal year on July 1, 1919, eight of the largest of the appropriation bills which the Democratic Congress had failed to enact into law before it went out of power. Those bills at the time of their failure were all pending in the Senate. The amounts carried in them at the time of their failure aggregated $3,768,000,000. The total of the same eight bills after their repassage was $2,828,000,000. The first legislative action of the new Congress resulted in the passage of these bills and the decrease of the appropriations proposed by the Democratic Congress for the fiscal year 1920 by $940,000,000. The estimates for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1921, and June 30, 1922, respectively, and deficiency estimates for prior years, were prepared by the Wilson administration and submitted to the Republican Congress. They were predicated upon that same basis of extravagant administration which had characterized the conduct of the administration even during the war period. The reductions made by the Congress in these estimates aggregated slightly more than $2,950,000,000. The total reductions which the Republican Congress effected in the amounts proposed to it by the Democratic administration for the fiscal years 1920, 1921, and 1922 reach $3,890,000,000.

Surely the American people have not forgotten this record of the Democratic Party when last in power. Its action in the House at this session on fiscal measures is but a continuance of the incapacity exhibited during its previous incumbencies in political control.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY'S RECORD

President Harding took office on March 4, 1921, and the Republican Party, under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, has been in constant control of all branches of the Government until the organization of the House of Representatives by the Democratic Party at this session.

The record of Government finances under the Republican Party from March 4, 1921, to June 30, 1930, the date upon which the disastrous effects of the world-wide depression seriously affected our public expenditures and revenues, is replete with achievement. Among the outstanding accomplishments are the following:

The establishment in 1921 of the Budget system for the orderly conduct of governmental finances.

Two successful revisions of the tariff for the protection of American labor and American industry and the raising of revenue.

Participation and leadership in international conferences for the limitation of armaments.

A decrease of more than $10,000,000,000 in the public debt from its peak and of $8,000,000,000 since the beginning of President Harding's administration, or an annual average of $875,000,000.

A decrease in the annual interest charge on the public debt of over $400,000,000.

Five reductions in taxation, with an aggregate decrease of $2,000,000,000.

A total of Treasury surpluses in 10 successive fiscal years aggregating over three and a quarter billions of dollars.

The repeal of war-time appropriations totaling $1,500,000,000.

WORLD DEPRESSION A FACTOR

The prolongation of the business depression and the paralysis of trade and commerce have caused disaster to the finances of the nations of the world. The falling off of public revenues and the necessity for added expenditures for relief purposes have made the task of statesmen difficult. Prudent nations, unlike prudent individuals, in prosperous periods do not set aside reserve funds for use in times of emergency, and consequently must resort to borrowing to meet current expenses when reverses overtake them. The United States in the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 has suffered respective deficits of $902,000,000 and $2,880,000,000, or a total of $3,782,000,000. Our revenues during these fiscal years were as follows:

Fiscal year 1930	$4,177,000,000
Fiscal year 1931	3,317,000,000
Fiscal year 1932	2,005,000,000

Adopting the revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, as normal, or nearly so, it will be seen that the decrease in revenues of $860,000,000 for 1931 under 1930 and $2,172,000,000 for 1932 under 1930, respectively, approximate the deficits for the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 of $902,000,000 and $2,880,000,000.

During each of the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 it was necessary to make unusual expenditures for relief purposes with a view to increasing employment and aiding in recovery. Public-works expenditures in 1931 totaled $575,000,000 and in 1932 they are estimated at $700,000,000 compared with a total of $410,000,000 in 1930 and $356,000,000 in 1929.

The fiscal year 1932 has carried a heavy burden of direct Government expenditures for relief purposes. The total for all expenditures during that fiscal year is $5,006,000,000. As compared to 1930 expenditures there are included in 1932 the following extraordinary items or extraordinary increases in items:

Increase for public works over 1930	$290,000,000
Reconstruction Finance Corporation	500,000,000
Capital stock of Federal land banks	125,000,000
Increased postal deficit	112,000,000
Increase for adjusted-service certificate fund to meet loans to veterans	88,000,000
Total	1,115,000,000

With the elimination of these extraordinary expenses from the actual expenditures for 1932, the total for 1932 becomes more than $100,000,000 less than the actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1930.

APPROPRIATIONS BACK TO LOW LEVELS

While it is not possible at this time to forecast the expenditures for the fiscal year 1933, some idea of comparison of that year with previous years may be obtained by examining the appropriations. The total of appropriations, after deducting the estimated postal revenue, is $3,886,000,000. This sum includes the figure of $322,000,000 contained in the emergency relief and construction act of 1932 as a pure emergency and relief matter decidedly peculiar to 1933. Deducting this amount from the total of $3,886,000,000, there remains a net of appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 of $3,564,000,000, as a charge against ordinary receipts. This figure will compare favorably with the lowest total of appropriations made for any fiscal year since the World War.

NATIONAL CREDIT PRESERVED

It is the duty of the executive and legislative branches of the Government to keep the Budget in a balanced condition. The national credit is exceedingly important at all times, but more particularly so in times of economic peril. No country can long have a sound credit basis which is continually borrowing to meet operating expenses, and the most salutary act of the present time is the insistence of the President and the acquiescence of Congress in the effort of balancing receipts and expenditures.

By reducing 1933 appropriations to a low level, by increasing public revenues to avoid or minimize borrowing, and by extending relief to agricultural, commercial, financial, industrial, and public enterprise through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on business principles the national credit will be preserved and improved and the basis established for a sound business recovery.

THE DEPRESSION WILL PASS

Too frequently in the political strife in which our country must necessarily indulge for the selection of public officials and the approval of policies economic conditions over which the Government and public officers have no control are likely to be urged as the determining factors rather than the more sane process of choosing men for their fitness for public office, their record in Government affairs, and their capacity and experience for the discharge of public duties in times of great stress and economic crises. Prejudice has no place in the decision of public questions and the choice of public servants. At this particular time in our national history, more even than in time of war, calm judgment and mature deliberation are required. The records of men and parties speak for themselves.

The Republican Party, under the banner of its previous leaders, has a history of capable management of government. Under President Hoover it has a definite program and a record of legislation for sound relief to assist our country back to the ways of prosperity and happiness. The United States is the least affected of all powerful nations by this economic holocaust. It will recover first, thanks to the forbearance and courage of its people and the wisdom of its leaders.

The year of 1932 is the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Through the sponsorship of the Government and its instrumentality, the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, the people of this great Nation are honoring the occasion and worshiping again at the shrine of patriotism of the Father of our Country. It is a refreshing and ennobling ceremony for our older citizens and an inspirational enthusiasm for the youth of the land. In this era of financial difficulty and physical and mental anguish for so many there is a large measure of individual and national courage to be obtained from the life and character of George Washington. From the hardships he endured and the courage and resourcefulness he exhibited in winning for us a national independence we will and must be invigorated to press forward to a new standard of national prosperity and spiritual life. This depression will end as surely as it came, and from its bitter experiences the American people will rise to greater heights.

ECONOMIC ISSUES

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to attend a political gathering on next Saturday at Blackshear, Ga., in my district, hear some good speeches and attempt to make one, but now find I can not do so.

I shall not leave Washington while Congress is in session, and therefore will remain here next Saturday and deny myself the anticipated great pleasure of attending the Blackshear political rally; but will now, and in this manner, avail myself of the privilege of saying in part some of the things I had hoped to say to the good people of Pierce and adjoining counties.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to observe how the people of our country are being misled into believing that the real trouble to-day is not in overcentralization of financial and political power and the abuse of that power but is somewhere else. The most awful crime of all time, with the possible exception of the World War, is being committed; and the criminals, the big financial interests of the country, are directing the attention and gaze of the public away from their own guilt and upon those who in their innocence are some of the real victims of these world robbers.

The sad truth is that many men, in Congress and out of Congress, who are now seeking election to Congress have been misled and evidently do not know the real cause of the present depression, and hence do not have the remotest idea as to how our present problems should be solved.

CONGRESSIONAL PLATFORMS

I wish everybody would study the various relief proposals advanced by candidates for Congress; especially do I beg the people to diligently study their platforms.

CAREFULLY PREPARED

These political platforms are carefully prepared, represent months of deep study of these candidates, and in most cases are the result of much advice from scores of enthusiastic friends.

PLATFORMS HAVE MERIT

In most instances these platforms—of candidates for Congress especially—have the merit of being short, very simple, and fully approved by the thousands of candidates who have used almost the identical platforms in thousands of races since "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

INTERESTING PLANKS

These planks are very interesting for many reasons. Some are interesting because it is much more difficult to get from them the real ideas of the candidate than it is to solve the most complex cross-word puzzle. Other planks of candidates who oppose those of us in Congress indorse our record here in the strongest terms and yet are so worded as to make the public believe that those of us in Congress voted and worked exactly the contrary to the course favored by the "outs" who are trying to get "in." Then again, these planks are often interesting because they show just how misguided the candidate is, how mistaken he is about the real causes of our tragic trouble, and how his pet relief proposals would not aid but would only make the situation more calamitous.

OLD-MODEL PLATFORM

I have in my hand and wish to quote in whole—it is very short and simple—one of the very kind of platforms I have been discussing. It is clearly an old model and is only different in that it has just one new but very dangerous and defective tabulating attachment. Let us read the first declaration from this platform. It is as follows:

The most important issue before the people to-day is whether or not we will reduce the cost of government.

Sounds good but is very erroneous. There are hundreds of issues vastly more important than the one mentioned. Here are some of them: The farm-relief issue, the unemployment issue, the transportation issue, various phases of the labor issue, immigration issue, the Muscle Shoals issue, the foreign-debt cancellation issue, the banking issue, the currency issue, the tax issue, and on and on ad infinitum.

Clearly the most important economic issue to-day is that issue or those issues which if properly solved would bring back real prosperity. If cutting the cost of the National Government would bring back prosperity, it would be here now, for this has been done.

PRESENT CONGRESS VOTED SALARY CUTS

Let us read the next solemn declaration of this platform:

The present Congress, while maintaining their large salaries, voted additional taxes upon the people.

This is another good-sounding statement but has the evil of stating exactly the opposite of what happened in so far as large and even small salaries are concerned. They were all cut. My salary and all my allowances were cut, with me voting for the cuts. I will vote for additional cuts of the larger salaries. I will go as far as any sane Member of Congress in this respect. I also voted against the tax bill and each and every paragraph thereof, against which objection is also lodged in this declaration.

Now let us read the very next declaration, which is as follows:

The Budget should be balanced by cutting expenditures and not by increased taxation, and I favor a general reduction in salaries of Government officials, including Congressmen, abolition of all useless departments, commissions, and bureaus, and the strictest economy in all branches of the Government.

It was absolutely impossible to balance the Budget by cutting expenditures at this session of Congress after the foreign debt moratorium and Reconstruction Finance Corporation acts were jammed through over the bitter protest of many Members, including myself. The payment some time ago of part of the adjusted-service compensation of the World War veterans, which I supported and which was right, also helped very much to get the Budget out of balance.

With all these emergency expenditures, if salaries had been reduced by taking off more than half, the Budget, yet would not have been balanced without much more. Still I and many others fought and voted against the tax bill objected to in this platform because, speaking for myself, I believed that all these emergency expenditures should be handled by a bond issue such as was done during the World War. If bonds had been issued for these purposes and to pay the balance due the veterans of the World War much more money would have been put into circulation. This would have been a greater relief measure than anything passed at this session.

CUTTING SALARIES OF CONGRESSMEN

It is interesting to listen at candidates who are trying to defeat a Member of Congress, urge that Congressmen's salaries should be further cut even though we have cut them by our own votes and are willing to vote to cut them further, when some of those same candidates who seem so much wrought up over this matter are now holding office and drawing more per year for the service rendered than any Congressman draws and have never seriously asked that their salary be reduced. Some of the men now urging salary reductions for everybody else, never begged for reduction of salaries when they, on a fee basis as prosecuting attorney, took in more cash in four or five days than a Member of Congress gets in a whole month. Not one only but scores of lawyers now are urging the cut of salaries of not only Members of Congress but also the cut of all wages of Government employees down to the poorest woman who crawls on her knees and scrubs the floors of the Government offices; yet many of these same lawyers, as candidates for Congress, talk of their great love for the farmer and at the same time often collect attorney's fees from farmers and others in noncontested mortgage foreclosures, and so forth, running into thousands of dollars for only a few minutes' actual work. These friends of the farmers say nothing about cutting lawyers' fees.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES ARE FOLKS

I know it is popular with some people to blame the panic on Government employees in Washington and say "the most important issue before the people to-day is whether or not we will reduce the cost of government" by cutting salaries of Government employees "down to the most humble." State officials get their salaries out of State funds when the real, awful burden is most heavy.

I am not talking about salaries of Members of Congress now when I ask the question Who are the Government employees in Washington? They are boys and girls, men and women from Georgia and other States, and almost without exception they all are sending money back home to father and mother to feed them and the rest of the family, to help pay taxes, and to keep the old home from selling. Fifteen of these folks come from in and around Douglas. The same is true of practically all the rest of my district and of the whole country.

A splendid young man raised in Douglas and an excellent young lady who attended school in Douglas are each secretary of two Congressmen from two different States other than Georgia. I know of a most splendid young lady who came to Washington and secured a job with the Government; later she brought one of her brothers up here and got him a nice job. After awhile she brought another brother and his wife, but was unable to get them work and is paying their board and trying to get employment for them; all this time this young lady is sending all the money she can home to the old folks.

This young lady's people live within 3 miles of one of the candidates for Congress from my district who is urging a salary cut of such as she as a solution for the present economic ills of the country.

I am saying this much about this feature of this platform to show how erroneous is the idea that the question of cutting salaries of Government employees is "the most important issue before the people to-day." Cutting wages or cutting prices of farm products will not solve our troubles.

Just one more word about reductions of small salaries. Big business wants salaries reduced so it can get labor for less and buy farm products for less. Never in the history of any country has Government wages went down without all wages going down carrying with them the prices of farm products. So a fight to drive wages of labor down is a fight to drive down the prices of farm products.

THE FARMER AND EVERYBODY ELSE

Again and again in all these discussions we come from everybody else back to the farmer. He is the keynote to the whole situation. Now the farmer and everybody else who owes money made debts while everything we sell was high and money worth much less than now. Thus it is the farmer and everybody else owes money which they can never pay unless we can raise the price of what the people sell or make money in circulation more plentiful. I repeat, the farmer and everybody else must get more for what they sell, be that labor or farm products, if they are to pay out of debt; otherwise the result is inevitable; they must lose out or bankrupt out.

USELESS DEPARTMENTS, BUREAUS, AND COMMISSIONS

Everybody is against useless departments, bureaus, and commissions. The real controversy arises as to which are useless. I joined with those at this session who opposed useless activities of the Government, but even when we abolished one, over our protest, others that I thought either useless or vicious were created. Take the very platform I am now discussing; it cries out against bureaus, boards, and commissions, and yet the last plank in this very platform is in favor of the largest, most powerful, most dangerous bureau ever proposed by any condidate for any office. I will hurry through so as to give ample consideration to this last plank.

ECONOMY

Of course, this platform, as usual, pledges the candidate to economy. The last plank in the platform, as I will later show, illustrates the economy he has in mind.

PROHIBITION

The plank on prohibition is as follows:

I favor a referendum on the prohibition question. The question of repeal of the eighteenth amendment should be submitted to the voters, and their decision control.

I will have to hear the gentleman discuss this plank further before I know what he means. I want him to explain: Does he mean a referendum as now provided by the Constitution or does he mean a statutory referendum, if possible, to be set up in the future? Does he favor a nation-wide, state-wide, or only a district referendum to act in an advisory capacity to the Member of Congress? How does he expect to settle the controversy by a referendum? What plan does he have in mind to cause all the wets to become dry as soon as they lose or to make all the drys wet if and when the referendum goes against them?

The main value of this plank in so far as the candidate is concerned is that it enables him to confidentially tell the wets he is with them and quietly and very confidentially tell the drys he is with them.

SOLDIERS' BONUS

On the question of the soldiers' bonus this candidate says:

I favor immediate payment in cash of the balance due our soldiers on their adjusted-service certificates.

This is the most definite and correct statement yet contained in this platform. The candidate, though, overlooked stating the fact that I and many others have always urged the cash payment of this debt that is just, due, true, and unpaid.

FOREIGN WAR DEBTS

The next plank is as follows:

I am opposed to any moratorium or cancellation of foreign war debts.

For many years I have made one of the fights of my life against these cancellations.

TARIFF

Here is this candidate's plank on tariff:

I am opposed to the present tariff law, which has ruined our foreign trade. I favor a much lower tariff, generally, on manufactures and reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries.

I am very proud of my record on tariff and approve this plank. I will discuss this plank under the candidate's plank touching farm relief, where tariff is again mentioned.

RAILROADS

The railroad plank is as follows:

I am for a square deal for our railroads, and all unfair competition to them should be impartially regulated.

The candidate is pleading for a square deal for the railroads. He need not be so solicitous about the big roads getting a square deal. The thing I fear is that the big lines will absorb or destroy all small lines, all bus lines, and then neither the laboring man, nor the farmer, nor the school children, nor the taxpayer, nor the public generally will get anything approaching a square deal. I discussed this subject at length in a written argument in favor of cheaper freight rates for the farmer, which I filed last summer with the Interstate Commerce Commission and later had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I will probably discuss it here again more fully in a few days but not now, as I just must hurry along, and after I discuss the so-called farm-relief plank, which is next, I shall deal at length with the last and most dangerous plank in this platform.

NEW FARM-RELIEF PLAN

This new plan consists of two sentences; in language, one long and one short; in new worth-while proposals, both very short.

SHORT FARM RELIEF PROPOSAL

The first sentence of the farm-relief plank of this candidate for Congress is as follows:

I have actively farmed for the past 10 years.

What difference does that make? Let us see. If this candidate is one of the farmers who planted only a small acreage of tobacco last year, had to borrow from the Government and over my bitter protest and in spite of my hard fight, had to agree to curtail his small crop in order to get money from the Government while his wealthy neighbors, not borrowing from the Government, were planting all they wished and even increasing their crops then he is in sympathy with the poor, sorely oppressed farmer and understands the hard fight I have been making here to see that all farmers get a square deal regardless of whether they are rich or poor.

Now, on the other hand, if this candidate happens to be a lawyer, who has held office practically all his life and became rich out of fees, commissions, salaries, and profits made out of the suffering and agonies of others caused by prosecutions, mortgages, foreclosures, bank failures, and loss of all their earthly possessions, and if this candidate is now and has been planting large acreages of tobacco without any control, not because he needs the money but simply to get more money, even though his large acreage helps to break the price of his poor neighbors' tobacco whose acreage is forced down arbitrarily and viciously by the Department of Agriculture before the poor farmers can get money to plant any cotton or tobacco, then honestly I can not see where the farming activities of this or any similar candidate give him special qualifications to come to Congress and represent these poor farmers, their wives and children, whose very lives are being ground out by him and similar friends of the farmer. I am making no accusations but simply making suggestions to show that the fact a man is actively farming is no indication he is a good friend of the farmers as a whole. All depends on whether he is farming the fields or farming his fellow man.

For instance many men now are engaged in chain farming and make money out of foreclosures on homes, as this helps them get the farmers' land at a sacrifice. Does any one feel that one of these fellows would be a good Congressman to represent the farmers in a fight for better prices, to stop farm foreclosures, reestablish the small farmer and turn back the awful menace of chain farming?

MORE FARM-RELIEF IDEAS

The balance of the farm-relief plank is as follows:

I shall do my best for the farmers, and I believe farm conditions can be improved by enforcing and strengthening our antitrust laws so as to destroy the Tobacco Trust, which fixes the price of tobacco, and other like trusts by Government financing of farm mortgages at low interest, by placing a tariff on raw agricultural imports which compete with our agricultural products, and by repealing all of the unfair laws passed by present and past Congresses in the special interest of the financiers and manufacturers.

This is a conglomeration of the impossible, the impractical, and skeletons of past accomplishments. Many here, including myself, have done everything we could to strengthen antitrust laws, but in spite of all laws men will be dishonest, evade the laws, rob the public, and get away with it.

Every new candidate for Congress this summer will promise farm relief, to fight trusts, to repeal bad laws, and pass good ones, to cut salaries and increase appropriations.

Even the candidate who is running on this platform I am now discussing by his very next plank proposes to do more for the most dangerous of all monopolies or trusts than was ever done before, and is earnestly advocating the one piece of legislation that would complete the awful monopolistic power of the manufacturing and financial trusts of the country in their wild desire to dominate the whole Government and all the people of the whole country, regardless of consequences.

TOBACCO PRICE FIXING

The way to overcome price fixing by the trusts is to put the Lankford contract plan of farm relief into effect and enable the farmer to name the price of what he sells as fully as others name the price of what they sell to the farmer.

FARM MORTGAGES

The Government is now indirectly financing farm mortgages; making small seed, feed, and fertilizer loans; and an orgy of foreclosures are taking place and on every hand is farm wreckage and despair. A new order must be brought out of chaos. I shall not now discuss this matter further, but refer to my past, present, and future activities as shown by my efforts in public and private. I shall later discuss this subject further before I conclude these remarks.

FARM RELIEF TARIFF

Tariff on raw agricultural imports has been mentioned as a means of farm relief. If this would solve the farm problem, our farmers would be rolling in wealth, and my district would be a paradise on earth.

I have always gone the limit in supporting tariff on farm products. Ask anyone who, during my service in Congress, has kept up with tariff on products of my farmers. Ask that good friend of the farmers, Hon. H. H. Webb, of Hahira. I know he is a candidate for commissioner of agriculture—and he will make a good one if elected—but even if he and I are both candidates for office, we do not mind telling the truth on each other when it is good. When I first came to Congress I voted for the emergency tariff bill giving tariff protection to farm products of my district and Nation, when I was the only Member of Congress in my State or any bordering State to vote for it.

I voted for tariff on peanuts, cottonseed meal, long-staple cotton, turpentine, and so on when my Democratic colleagues criticized me and said I was going too far.

I wrote with my own right hand and had inserted in the last tariff bill—even though I opposed the bill as a whole—the first tariff duty ever written in this country on tar, pitch of wood, and other products distilled from stumps and pine wood of my district, thus protecting so far as tariff will protect, the people of my district who own cut-over lands or pine stumps of any kind. This protection is against the cheap labor of Lapland, Russia, and other countries of northern Europe in competition with the products of our people.

NOT AMPLE FARM RELIEF

The awful distressing fact is that neither tariff nor any one nor all of the so-called farm relief plans will put the farmer on a parity with other people unless we can help him name the price of what he sells as fully as other people name the price of what they sell to him. Again I say, I know of no better plan for this than the Lankford contract plan.

FEDERAL GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS

Now for the last plank in this remarkable platform, which is as follows:

I favor the passage of a law whereby deposits in local banks will be guaranteed by the Government, so as to eliminate risk to the depositor.

I am very much in favor of some plan to guarantee bank deposits so as to eliminate risk to the depositor, but I feel that the burden of the guaranty should be on those who receive the benefit of the deposit or at least on those who are in the banking business.

BURDEN ON TAXPAYER

The plan proposed in the present platform of this candidate for Congress is the most extreme bank-insurance plan ever suggested. Let us see how it would work. The directors of a bank, president, and attorneys could have a glorious time voting each other large salaries, big attorneys' fees, unloading on the bank their unsecured worthless notes and sorry, run-down buildings at enormous profits to themselves; and when the bank broke, as it would, they would draw on the United States Government for enough to pay the depositors in full. Then the attorneys for the bank could get to be attorneys for the liquidating agents and get more big fees, and the officials could probably get jobs collecting notes and winding up the affairs of the bank.

If the attorneys and others could not collect the notes real soon, they could get an order and sell them and buy them in at a sacrifice for themselves and then make more profits. Of course, it would take a lot of money to pay all this for all banks that failed under this system, but the Government could and would be forced to squeeze taxes out of the poorest of the poor and everybody else to pay for the reckless extravagance and plunder of those to whom other people's money had been intrusted. Can anyone visualize how many more bank failures we would have had under this system than under present law, and can anyone even remotely estimate the enormous amount of taxes that would have been required to pay all these bank losses during the last few years?

If this insurance should be carried by the Government, why not let the Government carry $25,000 insurance on every life to be paid to next of kin? Why not let the Government carry all hail insurance, all fire insurance, all accident and health insurance, and all other kind of insurance? If the Government is to insure the debts of the bank and bank officials to the depositors, why not insure all the notes and accounts of all the people of the whole Nation? Then everybody would have plenty of credit and plenty of money but neither credit nor money would have any value; we would have no Government, and all would be chaos.

But it may be suggested the banks would have to make the Government safe by some method. This could be done, of course, by the bank investing all its deposits in gold or Government bonds and leaving this with a margin on deposit with the United States Treasury Department, but how could any bank do this and do business? Better let the depositor buy Government bonds or invest in postal accounts in the beginning. Some one suggests that the Government should certainly insure the deposits of all national banks that it permits to transact business. Suppose this was done; then all State banks would be immediately blotted out of existence, for a bank not guaranteeing deposits could not operate where there are banks backed up by a Government guaranty of deposits. Also the Government would be forced to close all small national banks and appoint all officers for the large ones that do run. The result would be two or three chain banks operating out of Wall Street in partnership with the Government doing the banking business of the whole country.

This would be centralization of financial and political power absolutely run mad. Rather than have this we better have no government and simply start again to build. This would be hydrophobic bureaucracy on a nation-wide and world-wide wild rampage. The most powerful trust of all times would name all officials and dictate with an iron hand all laws, State and Federal. Liberty would have vanished and we would be a bedlam of slaves.

The fear of this thing led me on the floor of the House, in speaking of proposals to guarantee bank deposits on the 18th day of June last, to use language as follows:

I favor a system of insurance of bank deposits so worked out as to preserve and provide for the return of the small independent community bank with its local interest and official control, and I oppose any scheme by whatever name or for whatever alleged purpose which will bring about a complete centralization of all banking and bank control and bank ownership in two or three chain bank monopolies with headquarters in Wall Street, New York.

FAVOR GUARANTY OF DEPOSITS

I feel that a reasonable guaranty of deposits law would go far toward a solution of the present depression. I am very much in favor of it. We must be careful, though. There is always an effort to take advantage of a popular move and put on some bad provision which could never be enacted otherwise.

For instance, an effort is being made in all this kind of legislation to bring about a greater centralization of financial and political power, thereby increasing and making absolute the very power that caused all our present troubles and which is now preventing their proper solution.

I will gladly support any move to safeguard the depositors unless there is coupled with the proposition more evil for the depositors and others than there is good.

DIFFICULT TASK

Most, if not all, the deposit guaranty laws have failed. If the banks are taxed to create a guaranty fund, it has been found almost impossible to levy a tax big enough to raise enough funds to pay the losses without wrecking more banks than ever, and the scheme fails. I have already pointed out the evils of the Government assuming this risk. I would not want the people of my district—many of whom have no money in banks—taxed to pay for losses caused by wildcat banking in Chicago, New York, or Boston. Such a scheme is not sound from any standpoint.

DOUBLE-STOCK LIABILITY

The law putting double liability on stockholders for benefit of depositors is a form of deposit guaranty. It, though, does not at all protect the depositors.

Statistics show that less than one-sixth of this double liability is collected and that depositors actually get in cash only 5 cents on the dollar on their deposits in closed banks as the result of this double-stock liability.

Most of this amount is from widows, orphans, and the poorer stockholders, who are not lawyers or able to hire lawyers to avoid the liability. The officials when they see the storm coming in many cases avoid this liability by unloading their stock on some one else, probably a widow, orphan, or some poor person.

I am not personally criticizing any particular individual; I am talking about conditions and showing how difficult it is to work out a law for the average man which is not abused, to the injury of the very people we are trying to help.

A guaranty of bank deposits law, in order to be effective, bring back confidence, and protect the depositors, must encourage honest banking instead of putting a premium on wildcat, dishonest bank manipulations. The honest citizen should not be taxed more than he receives in return from his Government. Honest bankers should not be forced to pay an unreasonable assessment to take care of wild, crooked, dishonest officials. Millions of money can be saved to the depositors by a governmental agency, possibly cooperating with a similar State agency, empowered to conserve, collect, and properly disburse the assets of closed banks.

The small depositors should be paid at once if possible. Entirely too much money is paid out to attorneys and others after the bank closes and not enough goes to the depositors. All banks in order to become the beneficiaries of returned confidence could afford to pay a reasonable assessment or tax, to be matched by State and Federal funds to provide for a liquidation agency and funds to guarantee to the depositors honesty in banking both before and after the doors of the bank are closed.

I pledge myself to work for a safe, sane, effective method of making the deposits of our banks as secure as is humanly possible, commensurate with fair dealing of men with their fellow men, honest banking, and good government.

From every standpoint the proposal in this platform for the Federal Government to guarantee all bank deposits is one of the most powerful, dangerous, and far-reaching bureaucratic plans that ever came to my attention.

OTHER PLATFORMS

Of course there are thousands of proposals each campaign year, but the platform I have just quoted and discussed in full is typical of most that are abroad in the land at this time.

ERRONEOUS IDEAS

Many of the proposals in various platforms are based on mistaken ideas. For instance, I saw the other day where some one said there were as many negroes as white people employed in Government departments in Washington. This is not the case. There are many, many times more whites than negroes employed in the Government departments. No one has criticized the negro situation in Washington more than I have, but there is nothing gained by making the situation worse than it is.

I feel that during this awful time every campaign should be based on real issues, and before mentioning a few more minor issues or suggestions I will speak further about a suggestion I saw some time ago in reference to relieving unproductive property of all taxes.

The question of taxes is always most important. The only thing of more importance in a financial way to the workingman is employment and the wages or salary earned and received. The farmer is more interested in production and good prices for his products.

And yet burdensome taxes levied and collected out of proportion to the benefits received may financially wreck the man with even a good income. Therefore the subject of taxes is of greatest importance.

"The power to tax is the power to destroy." The power to tax has often been used to lessen or even destroy that which is not desirable. Light taxes or even no taxes should be imposed on those things essential to our national existence. A heavy tax is most essential to lessen or destroy a vicious system, which may undermine and even destroy our Government. To my mind there is very serious danger of consolidation under corporate ownership of large areas of land now being taken over by foreclosures and the installation of chain farming, to the destruction of the small individual home-owning farmer. This would entirely eliminate the small country home and all their influence for good.

The highest type of our citizenship would disappear, our institutions would be endangered, and our great principles of free government would perish from the earth. The American home and its sacred influence for good is the very bedrock of our national existence. Our homes must be preserved or all will be lost.

This is the very reason I am fighting for a tax exemption of property for home purposes and is the very reason I am fighting to stop mortgage foreclosures on homes and provide for the return of those already taken over and aid to the farmer and laborer to get sufficient pay for their labor to enable them to keep and own a home. This is the reason I am bitterly opposed to relieving from all taxes large areas of nonproductive lands. Let us relieve from taxes for home purposes the productive and nonproductive lands to a reasonable amount where the American family lives.

I realize that there is much merit in a plan to relieve lands from taxes where there is growing nonproductive timber and let the taxes, if any, be paid as to this property when the timber is used and brings revenue to the owner.

The thing I fear is any system to relieve nonproductive lands of taxes, which would encourage great corporations to buy up and hold in a nonproductive state or condition large areas of our land and pay no taxes, while our home owners are losing their homes by foreclosures and as the result of most vicious and burdensome taxes.

This kind of a tax scheme would force the small-home owner out of existence and make his property tax free as soon as it became nonproductive, owned by great corporate interests, and the old homestead became the habitat of bats and owls. I do not want this. I shudder at the idea. There is too much of it now. Let us relieve the little family homestead of all taxes—city, county, State, and Federal—and force large areas of land into the ownership of thousands, yea millions, of happy, contented families to bless and preserve our Nation.

If you want to relieve unemployment in the city, help me bring about the tax-exempt small home for the family. If you want real farm relief, do this: Stop mortgage foreclosures and help me work out a contract system of production, marketing, and price control. If you want a good banking system, not only work for good banking laws but also help me fill this country with happy, prosperous farmers with their families, and the merchants, bankers, and all will be prosperous again.

If you want to aid in a real movement back to the farm, help me put over my relief proposals and real success is assured. Let us do these things and the institutions of free government will remain, our great principles of liberty become permanent, our wonderful citizenry last forever, and this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth.

They tell me that if the sun of the heavens was blotted out, in three days and nights the gloom of darkness and the awful chill of utter coldness would destroy every particle of life on earth. The home is the sun of our civilization. Without the home there would be no sunshine of love and patriotism, and the government of men could not withstand the darkness and chill of selfishness and hatred that would envelop the earth.

Our forefathers came to this continent in search of homes. Our every conflict has been waged for homes and those who live in homes.

The depression is destroying our homes. We must fight as never before for our homes.

I can do anything else in my campaign for Congress with less embarrassment than answer the inquiry "What has LANKFORD done?" If I name in detail only a few things I have done, my enemies say I am boasting; if I name none, they say I admit doing nothing. So either answer is criticized. Then, again, it is impossible to give any sort of a detail report without writing volumes of books. So I shall now in a few sentences mention only a very few of the outstanding things I have materially helped in accomplishing:

(1) Wrote and secured adoption of Lankford lien amendment to Volstead Prohibition Act, which is approved by both wet and dry forces as best amendment proposed or adopted to this act and as saving many hundreds of millions of dollars for innocent owners of automobiles and other carrier vehicles.

(2) Author of and secured adoption of Lankford amendment to War Finance Corporation act making available for discount with this financial agency hundreds upon top of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of notes, mortgages, and other paper, thus protecting farmers, supply men, small business concerns, and banks in a way never before done and not at all accomplished in recent Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

(3) Fought to keep alive War Finance Corporation, with benign provisions for farmers under Lankford amendment, and used every possible effort to make recent Reconstruction Finance Corporation act as helpful to average citizen as was the War Finance Corporation act.

(4) Made speeches on floor of Congress against crookedness and corruption in Veterans' Bureau and Department of Justice long before these matters were generally discussed in Congress and before heads of this bureau and department were removed or convicted.

(5) Secured tariff on several farm products not heretofore included in tariff schedules.

(6) Together with Congressman W. W. LARSEN, worked out and wrote into the McNary-Haugen bill the provision keeping equalization fee in that bill from ever being levied on farmers' cotton at gin or while cotton is in ownership of farmer and providing equal protection to other farm products.

(7) Author of Lankford contract system for farm relief, admitted by many Cabinet members, Congressmen, and Senators as best farm-relief plan yet proposed.

(8) Suggested Lankford contract-relief plan to platform committee last Democratic convention and principle of plan is incorporated in national Democratic platform and specifically approved by Governor Roosevelt in his acceptance speech.

(9) Am leader of fight to stop present orgy of loan foreclosures and to return taken-over farms to original owners. Author of two bills and several amendments for these purposes.

(10) Opposed to the last limit foreign debt moratorium, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and all similar legislative proposals.

(11) Author of Lankford proposed amendment to Federal Constitution to exempt from all taxes reasonable amount of property for home purposes.

(12) I favor and fight for all legislation in behalf of labor, the farmer, the veteran, and the independent private citizen.

(13) Helped secure much more money for Georgia than ever before for public roads, vocational education, river and harbor improvements, and other purposes, with Georgia all the while actually paying out in cash as taxes to Federal Government much less than Georgia gets back from the Government.

(14) Last summer I either saw personally or wrote every member and senator of State legislature and begged them to pass amendment to State constitution to let people in my State vote upon payment of poll tax only and not require for voting privilege payment of all taxes.

(15) Worked for and voted for distribution of flour through Red Cross. Introduced bill and helped secure passage of law to distribute cotton and cotton goods to suffering through Red Cross, and introduced and am fighting for bill for Government to help farmers by buying farm products directly from the farmer for the starving veterans and others in Washington and elsewhere instead of paying enormous prices for this same food from speculators.

(16) Have never left Washington while Congress was in session except to attend funeral of Georgia colleague.

(17) Work from 12 to 15 hours a day on legislative and departmental work.

(18) Have attendance record excelled by none.

(19) Helped to work out and am largely responsible for actual physical detail survey for barge-canal purposes across south Georgia and north Florida, with work to begin at once and $90,000 cash available.

(20) Have seniority and committee assignments, giving me close personal contact throughout country and Congress, which are most valuable and putting me in line when the Democrats come in next year to carry into effect many of the plans for which I have fought so long.

(21) Have handled thousands upon thousands of matters for people in all walks of life, and am anxious to render in the future the very best possible service.

(22) My office in Washington stays open the year round and is never closed to my people when they need help or are in Washington, and neither my eyes, ears, nor heart are ever anywhere closed to the needs or voice of the folks of my district, State, or Nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great pity that so many people seek the defeat of public officials by distorting, magnifying, and charging up to them trivial incidents for which they are not responsible and totally ignoring all the good that they ever accomplished.

Congressmen are criticized for using the franking privilege by county newspapers, when the free-in-county local paper provision of the postal laws caused a cash loss to the Government last year fifteen times as large as the franking privilege for all purposes, and the Government in handling all newspapers and periodicals last year lost in cash more than one hundred and eighty times as much as the franking privilege cost.

I saw in a newspaper the other day where it was said that the transportation cost of a speech franked out to a farmer was paid by the farmer. The fact is the farmer and the common people either directly or indirectly pay all or the larger part of all Government expenses, and therefore the farmer in my district helps pay the same amount for operating the Postal Service regardless of whether I send him a speech or not. The sending of one of my speeches to a voter does not cost him an extra one-thousandth of a cent. It cost him absolutely no additional amount.

Again this paper said the printing of extracts from the RECORD for distribution cost the Government a large amount. Well, this summer I intend to have hundreds of thousands of different pieces from the RECORD printed in my district paid for there, mailed under frank there, and delivered there, all nearly a thousand miles from Washington. I want my inquiring friends to ascertain who pays for this local printing, the amount extra the postmaster and his employees get for handling this mail, and how much the salary of the rural carriers is increased the day he carries my articles, and he will find that Uncle Sam did not pay a single extra red cent for or on account of this transaction.

The expense is running, and the only question is, Do I want my people to hear from me and am I willing to pay for them to get this information?

With the machinery already in operation and the entire cost already provided for me to advise my people of my record, I certainly would be subject to severe criticism if I refused to pay for the printing to advise my people concerning my stewardship as their servant. I am glad to do it. I wish I was able to pay for and send out much more. I wish my people could get a report from me every few days.

Some one the other day was criticizing Members of Congress because they have offices in a good building. Might as well criticize the sheriff because he has an office in a brick courthouse.

It is even said Members of Congress get free barber service. Another mistake; there are barber shops in House Office Building patronized by everybody, where Representatives pay for service but can save time by the barber phoning them when ready for them instead of them going down town and spending much time waiting. The Government does not pay all hospital and doctor bills of Members of Congress and their families. I could have saved thousands of dollars if this had been true. Criticism has been made because the Government pays a small allowance on account of funeral of a Member of Congress. This is an old law passed years ago. I did not pass it and am glad, so far, I have never let the Government spend a cent of this fund on my account. I also sincerely promise my people that if they will reelect me I will faithfully, honestly, and to the best of my ability for the next two years continue to dodge automobiles, drink wholesome fresh water, and eat the kind of good food I used to get down home, when I can get it, and if at all possible save the Government and my friends all funeral expenses on my account. I also ask unanimous consent to then get as long an extension as possible from the cost of this unwelcome, inevitable, last earthly ceremony.

IMMATERIAL HINTS VERSUS WORLD-WIDE PROBLEMS

I am again mentioning a few of the many mistaken or trivial ideas about Members of Congress to emphasize that all these innumerable innuendos and insinuations which are now being spit on all Members of Congress, good and bad, are only so many grains of shifting sand and mist as compared to the mighty, towering mountains piled on tremendous ranges of mountains of vital, economic, nation-wide, world-dominating, all-powerful problems which must be studied and solved if our people are to remain free and this Nation endure.

WHY THROW DIRT?

Why try to kick dust in the eyes of the people and prevent their seeing and knowing the truth? Why try to blind people to the real issues, on the proper solution of which hang the very liberty, fortunes, and lives of them and their children forever?

ON MY RECORD OR NOT AT ALL

I want to be reelected to Congress on my record and what I am fighting to accomplish or not at all. Please do not either elect or defeat me on the defects or mistakes of others, in or out of Congress. See if my heart is right with my people; see if I am working with all my might for the right; then see if my years of service better fits me to do what I am striving to do and then vote for the man whom you believe is able to and will render the best service to you, your wife and your children, and to your country.

ENDEAVORED TO RENDER BEST SERVICE

When I first came to Congress I got on available committees where I thought I could render the best service. Many years went by before I had sufficient seniority to get on the very largest committees.

ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION COMMITTEE

The people of my section were much interested in drainage but no Member of Congress from the coastal plains of the Atlantic had ever taken enough interest in Federal drainage to get on this committee and stay there until he became chairman and was in position to do real things in the way of drainage for the swamp lands of East and South. I resolved to do this. Time went by and about three years ago I saw that if the Democrats organized the House I would reach my goal of chairmanship of this committee.

CHANGES CAME

My happiness soon was turned into sadness by the awful economic changes which convinced me that the demand for drainage was not so great and that the farmers were fighting to save their homes and even the lands which do not require drainage.

BILL TO SAVE HOMES OF FARMERS

I then passed the drainage idea by for the present but worked out a bill to stop mortgage foreclosures and return taken-over farm lands to the original owners or farmers and thus reclaim from the floods of unfair legislation and the desert of the depression the lands and homes of the farmers.

REFERRED TO MY COMMITTEE

Being a lawyer and knowing a little parliamentary law, I worded my bill so as to cause it to be referred to my committee, so I, when I became chairman, could speed up its enactment. I was more anxious than ever to be chairman.

DEATH OF CONGRESSMAN EDWARDS

My beloved colleague Congressman Edwards, serving on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, had rendered most splendid service to my district and his untimely death forced me to decide whether I would keep my old committee assignments or give them up and go on the Rivers and Harbors Committee to make a more determined fight than ever before for a canal across south Georgia and north Florida and to represent Georgia and the Nation in river and harbor legislation. The House Committee on Rivers and Harbors was an exclusive committee and its members could not serve on any other committee.

HAD TO MAKE SACRIFICE

The fight was so determined over the construction of the canal and over the question of whether it should be located wholly in Florida or part in Florida and part in Georgia until I felt called upon to make whatever sacrifice might be necessary to go on this committee in behalf of the people of my State.

GAVE UP IMPORTANT CHAIRMANSHIP

I had nourished a lifelong ambition to be chairman of one of the important committees of Congress. It was now within my reach and carried about $4,000 a year committee clerical appointments which I could give my friends. The temptation was strong, but I decided that it was my solemn duty to go on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and acted accordingly.

AM HAPPY

I am glad I did this. I anticipated that one of my good friends, Mr. ALLGOOD, of Alabama, Mr. HALL, of Mississippi, would become chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. Mr. ALLGOOD took chairmanship of the Committee on War Claims, and Mr. HALL of Mississippi became chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

RETAINED ALL COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

I gave up the chairmanship, but for the first time arrangements were made for Members serving on Rivers and Harbors to stay on other committees. So I remained on my committees and have also been able to serve my district on the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

WILL BUILD CANAL THROUGH DISTRICT

I have every reason to confidently say that my seniority in Congress, my place on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and my other committee assignments will enable me in the very near future to help bring about the construction of the canal connecting the intercoastal waterway of the Gulf with that of the Atlantic, and that it will be through the new eighth congressional district of Georgia.

HAVE BEST COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS FOR MY PEOPLE

I can do more for my people on my committees than on any others. I would not exchange with anybody. I can render the best service where I am.

WILL BE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

When the Democrats win this fall I will become chairman of the great Committee on Public Lands, dealing with these enormous properties of ours. From this vantage point I hope to be able to help our new Chief Executive, President Roosevelt, put into effect his ideas of reforestation of so much importance to my section of Georgia. Clinch county, where I was born, is the greatest turpentine timber section on earth, and as her native son, I am most anxious as chairman of this great committee, to bring to the attention of the world as never before the merits of our timber products and help solve our many timber problems.

WILL BE VICE CHAIRMAN OF IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION

I will at the same time be vice chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, where Chairman HALL and many other colleagues are helping me carry on the fight to pass my bill and stop loan foreclosures and undo so far as possible, the harm already done. I did my very best to pass this bill at this session but with President Hoover and his departments against us there was no way to bring it to a successful conclusion. I introduced the bill in several forms, offered it as an amendment wherever possible, held numerous conferences with department chiefs and leaders of both parties but was face to face with an unsurmountable wall of opposition.

Governor Roosevelt favors my idea of preventing mortgage foreclosures and returning farm lands to original owners. I believe we will pass it at the next Congress.

WONDERFUL OPPORTUNITY FOR WORK

I feel that I am on the eve of the greatest opportunity that ever came to anyone in my section to render real service to my people. Never were my people in greater need. With my human limitations and by the help of my people, I have given the most sympathetic study to their every problem, my seniority in Congress and on important committees gives me vantage points from which I can wage their battles as never before. I would feel that I was a traitor to my people and my Government if any amount of inducement under these circumstances at this time caused me to falter or voluntarily abandon these important undertakings which mean life or death for my people. The Democratic Party has indorsed many of my plans for aid to the farmer, the laborer, and the average citizen, the Democratic nominee for President, Governor Roosevelt, gives them his heartiest approval; I will not turn back, but go straight ahead to battle and to win.

Mr. Speaker, my people have suffered more than ever before. I have urged all these years that they were not getting a square deal. I have said that the proposed farm relief plans offered by others would fail. They have failed. I have been pleading for what I believed would solve the farmers' problems. The Democrats have not had full control of Congress for a single minute since I came to Congress.

It now looks like a new day and a "new deal" is at hand for my people and the Nation. I am confident of Democratic victory this year. My principles have been incorporated in the Democratic platform and were indorsed by Governor Roosevelt in his speech of acceptance. The first rays of Democratic victory are already in the eastern sky. The blessed sunshine of human rights will soon be shining. I am happy at the approaching chance to serve my people more fully than ever before.

When the Democrats come into power next year there will be great need for men who are familiar with the snares of those who are antagonistic to my people. There will be need for men true and tried, whose hearts are right, and whose experience here enables them to do the right thing at the right time for the right people. A new man, especially if he has had no legislative experience and is not a lawyer, for many years will do the wrong thing, even when he wants to do right. He is at the bottom of the smallest committees. He has to spend years of study before he is of much value to his district in small matters or of any value in the mighty problems. The young Member naturally seeks information from older Members, and thus, innocently on his part, he is too often misled by those who are the leaders for those who oppose my people.

We are opposed here by the best lawyers money can buy—lawyers in Congress and out of Congress—who study day and night to win for those who pay them tremendous fees.

I recently saw where a candidate for Congress said the farmers and common people needed in Congress less lawyers and more new Members of Congress. The big interests have, and will have, in Congress and everywhere in and around Congress experienced, brainy lawyers with years and years of experience in congressional work. The powerful interests, with these lawyers, are happy every time the farmer, the laborer, or the common people lose from Congress a lawyer, a man of brains, or a man of congressional seniority. It matters not how honest the new Member may be.

The big interests spend millions of campaign funds every year to bring about a change in which experienced men opposing them are swapped for new men they can control, at least until they gain more experience. Next year there will be tried here legislative issues constituting the greatest legal battle ever waged on earth. The big interests will have on their side the best obtainable brainy legal talent with the greatest possible experience in legislative matters. On the other side will be the common people. Shall they, the common people, have new men with no legislative experience and little or no legal ability? Let us not handicap the new Democratic administration by giving it only little or no cooperation of men with every requirement of experienced, honest, fearless, able legislators.

Some one said recently in a campaign speech that there was need of more brains in Congress. There are plenty of brains here; in fact, there is too much on the wrong side. We need to keep the brains, talent, seniority, and legal training that are fighting for the right and add to it. When the big interests hire a man to represent them in shaping legislation here they invariably get a man who is loyal to them, a man of talent, generally a lawyer and always a man who has had long legislative experience in Congress. Why should not the common people have the same kind of representation.

Democratic victory is just ahead. Let us not fight over immaterial issues but, using our best judgment, fight the really big evils and victory will be ours.

The dawn of a new day is here. The sunshine will soon appear. The night has been filled with the darkness of the accumulated human wrongs of the centuries; the lightnings of a righteously indignant people, forked and terrific, have rent the awfulness and gloom of world-wide human suffering; the thunders of dissatisfaction, of complaints, of outraged and dying, suffering men, women, and children, and of the terrors of a threatened war of extinction of the race, have filled the earth and leaped to the heavens, pleading and praying for justice. The God of the storm and the sunshine, of wrong and of right, of darkness and light, who controls the day and the night, will hear his people. Justice will prevail; the darkness of error and crime will flee; the sunshine of justice will come again; the daylight of right and of liberty with all its effulgent glory will again bless all humanity everywhere.

"SEVEN ROADS TO RUIN"—DEMOCRACY CHARTS THE PATHWAYS WITH FANTASTIC LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, President Hoover has given statement to the fundamental truth that "We can not squander ourselves into prosperity."

And yet this is precisely what the Democratic majority of the House of Representatives has persistently undertaken to do at this first session of the Seventy-second Congress. The Democratic majority has pursued this course in the face of repeated warnings of the President that the most rigid of economies were necessary because of vast shrinkages in Federal revenues from income and other tax sources.

It is little wonder then that enlightened members of this body as well as nonpartisan observers elsewhere have found occasion to express publicly their thanksgiving that a Republican President and a Republican Senate have throttled this Frankenstein legislation which the Democratic majority has presented to this House.

If a political party were to set out upon a deliberate policy designed to wreck the country, to reduce its people to poverty and despair, it could not do better than to emulate the Democratic leadership which in the brief span of seven months offered to America seven roads to ruin.

What is of vastly more importance is that the party which dedicated its best efforts toward plunging our common country into the abyss, through "pork-barrel" proposals, grotesque financial schemes involving the expenditure of colossal sums of money to be wrung from already overburdened taxpayers, now seeks the support of the electorate in extending its control to every branch of the Federal Government.

I desire to call attention briefly to the seven specific proposals which constitute the major portions of the program presented to this House by the responsible leaders of Democracy.

First. A bond issue to construct 2,300 unneeded post offices and to carry out other public works for the most part unnecessary even in the present or the long-view future.

Second. The issuance of $2,500,000,000 of fiat currency to pay the soldiers' bonus; currency which might have been worth 50 cents on the dollar and which would have reduced the value of all existing currency and consequently all property values.

Third. Legislation to squander billions in the futile effort to peg commodity prices.

Fourth. The establishment of a gigantic Federal pawnbroking business through the proposal of Speaker GARNER to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provide loans to individuals, private corporations, partnerships, States, and municipalities on any conceivable security and for any conceivable purpose; a proposal which would have set up the greatest bureaucracy in all the history of all the governments of the world; a bureaucracy which would have held the power of life and death over industries and whole communities; a bureaucracy which would have cost the taxpayers of the United States untold billions; a bureaucracy which would have become a superpolitical power, greater even than the Government itself.

Fifth. A deliberate refusal to accomplish any appreciable lasting economies in the conduct of the costly Federal establishment by (1) refusing authority to the President to reorganize various divisions of Government machinery and (2) by reducing proposed governmental savings in the economy bill from $200,000,000 to little more than $40,000,000.

Sixth. Legislation to guarantee deposits in closed Federal reserve system member banks, irrespective of whether failures of such banks were due to inefficient management or sheer dishonesty of their officials.

Seventh. A proposal to embroil the United States in all of the trade wars of the world by inviting the nations to enter into a conference at which the purely domestic American policy of the tariff would be determined.

With the single exception of the tariff bill, these grotesque proposals for relief in this most serious period of the economic life of the Nation failed to draw specific indorsement in the platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention. But they were given blanket approval in the action of that convention in nominating by acclamation as its vice presidential candidate the one man who sponsored the most vicious of these proposals and whose acquiescence permitted passage by the House of all the others—Speaker JOHN N. GARNER.

Accepting his nomination by the convention as a 100 per cent approval of his course, the Speaker, in a series of addresses made during his journey back home to the plains of Texas, praised his own handiwork and asked for its approval by the electorate.

Had all of these schemes become law—as unquestionably they would have under an administration by present Democratic leadership—we would have violated the precept laid down by President Hoover that "We can not squander ourselves into prosperity."

Nay, more than that, we would have seen the public debt increased by from four to seven billions of dollars. The Nation, just now beginning to feel the effects of the staggering load of the billion dollar tax bill made necessary in the balancing of the Federal Budget, would have faced another vast increase in taxes, an increase which it would have been beyond the ability of the great masses to bear.

Fortunately for the Nation, the President was able through the exercise of great patience and rare courage to have written into law a relief program which entails no additional burden upon the taxpayer, preserves the integrity of the dollar, and yet furnishes relief where relief is needed all along the line in industry, in commerce, in agriculture, in labor, and in the home.

I invite the American people to compare the unsound and unwise program of Democratic leadership with the far-seeing, constructive plan of President Hoover which now is enacted into law. It offers road to recovery just as surely as the Democratic leadership in this House offered seven short cuts to ruin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I yield to Senators who have risen to present routine business.

REPORT ON PROHIBITION

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD a report adopted by the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at the annual meeting of the board on July 8, 1932.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

REPORT ON PROHIBITION ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF TEMPERANCE AND SOCIAL SERVICE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD ON JULY 8, 1932

HISTORIC POSITION OF METHODISM

The warfare between Methodism and traffic in intoxicating liquors is inevitable and irrepressible. Our founder, John Wesley, branded the dram sellers of his day as "poisoners general," and his true followers to-day recognize the traffic as being the greatest public enemy of the individual, the school, the home, and the church. It is not a question of Puritanism or forcible individual repression, but of the "general welfare," of the right of society to protect itself from the alcoholic indulgence of individual citizens. Whatever form the warfare may assume, whatever be the particular battle in the war, the issue is always fundamentally between the selfish appetite of the drinker and the greed for gold of the seller on the one hand, and the protection of the individual, the home, and society on the other.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC CRIMINAL

United Methodism the world round declares to-day that the brand of the criminal should be placed upon a traffic which changes normal men and women into silly, reckless fools, and crazy, dangerous brutes, and thus not only destroys them individually but makes them a burden and menace to the entire social order. The killing of 35,000 and the maiming of nearly 1,000,000 persons in automobile accidents furnishes the basis for simply one unanswerable social protest against any relaxation of the prohibition law. During the past half century of warfare to remove the strangle hold of the liquor traffic upon the industrial, political, social, and domestic life of the Nation, Methodism has ever been in the forefront of every battle, and Methodist pulpits, Methodist district, annual, and general conferences have recorded relentless opposition to the traffic and invincible determination to outlaw it as the common enemy of the race. Whatever other church, social or political groups may say or do, Methodism will not lower her standards or agree to give a legal status to the traffic in intoxicants anywhere under the flag.

POSITION OF METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH

Before and since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has declared its approval of that amendment, and since 1920 its opposition to any modification or repeal. In 1930 the general conference at Dallas, Tex., adopted unanimously the report of the committee on temperance presented by Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina, chairman, and A. D. Betts, of South Carolina, secretary, in which report it was declared:

"We firmly set our faces against any recession from the constitutional outlawry of the liquor traffic. We highly resolve to enlist our every power to retain in full force the eighteenth amendment and all laws of State and Nation for its observance and enforcement. We will never surrender the advance made for national sobriety. We would add our clear and definite affirmation of the clear and inalienable right of every member of our church, whether minister or layman, to oppose and to vote against any candidate from constable to President who fails to stand for the principles herein advanced and approved. We urge our people to select public officers who believe in the enforcement of the law, not only because prohibition is the law but because it ought to be the law."

At every national political convention since the ratification of the eighteenth amendment in 1920 representatives of our board have appeared and stated to the committee on resolutions of the conventions the position of our general conference that prohibition is a nonpartisan question, and they have opposed the adoption of any prohibition plank, wet or dry, asking simply for a law enforcement plank, and from 1920 to 1928, inclusive, the conventions of both parties took the action requested. The leadership and work of the board, which include these representations, was specifically approved by the general conference of 1930.

For the first time in 1932 both the major political parties have made platform declarations on prohibition, against vigorous protests of the combined dry organizations of the country, our board included, which insisted that prohibition be not made the subject of national political party action. We are now faced, therefore, with an entirely new phase of prohibition warfare and must adjust our program to the changed conditions. What are the facts?

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

The Republican platform pledges the party to efficient law enforcement, opposes any form of attempted nullification, sets forth the futility of so-called referendums, emphasizes that prohibition is not a party political issue, that no public official (which includes President, Vice President, Senators, Congressmen, State legislators) nor any members of the Republican Party are bound by the convention's action on this question; declares that the progress and the gains which have already been made in dealing with the evils inherent with the liquor traffic must be preserved and the evils eliminated, and declares that the convention does not favor submission of the question of retention or repeal of the eighteenth amendment without a substitute therefor, the substance of which substitute is set forth in the resolutions adopted, and finally declares that Congress should submit the proposed substitute in order that the people be given the opportunity to decide whether they will retain the eighteenth amendment unchanged or will ratify an amendment which will permit the several States to legalize the sale of intoxicants, such legislation, however, to be subject to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition exists, and to safeguard the citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and its attendant evils. The platform indicates no preference between the eighteenth amendment and the proposed substitute, but leaves the decision of that question to be determined by the people without any recommendation by the convention.

Should the amendment proposed by the Republican Convention be ratified by the people, while it is true that the States will have power to legalize the liquor traffic, this power would be subject to the declared duty of Congress to protect those States where prohibition exists, and furthermore the Constitution itself would positively forbid the return of the saloon.

Briefly, therefore, the Republican platform takes no position for or against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but does oppose repeal without constitutional safeguards against the saloon and the violation of the rights of the States.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

The Democratic platform declares that it favors the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, the immediate submission by Congress of a resolution to effect such repeal, the immediate modification of the Volstead Act, to legalize beer and other beverages permissible under the Constitution, to provide proper and needed revenue, urging the States to enact measures to prevent the return of the saloon, and to bring the liquor traffic under the complete supervision and control of the States, and also demanding that the Federal Government effectively exercise its power to enable the States to protect themselves against the importation of intoxicating liquors in violation of their laws.

The Democratic platform makes no reference to enforcement of the prohibition law nor any statement that prohibition is not a partisan political issue, absolving members of the party from any obligation to be bound by the prohibition plank, which plank is therefore as binding as any other part of the platform.

Briefly, should the prohibition amendment proposed by the Democratic Convention be ratified by the people, the legal status of the liquor traffic would be exactly the same as obtained before the ratification of the amendment, with no Federal constitutional guaranty against the return of the saloon.

RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE

Any attempt by any party platform declaration to bind the members of that party on a moral issue is a distinct invasion of the moral realm and is, therefore, not only an indefensible infringement of the rights of conscience, but a gross insult to independent citizenship. Such action will be repudiated by conscientious men and women throughout the country, and this entirely apart from prohibition. It is amazing that such action should have been permitted without vigorous persistent protest. Even though doomed to sure defeat by intolerant wet fanaticism, as voiced from the floor and the galleries, this attempt by political convention, to bind the attitude and action of members of a party on a great moral question, should have been denounced and resisted to the limit and a recorded aye and nay vote demanded, before such unprecedented action was finally taken.

WHAT FOR THE FUTURE?

Endeavoring to meet the obligation laid upon this board by the general conference action, we emphasize:

1. That the general conference declared in 1930 with the full knowledge of the facts that the eighteenth amendment is the expression of the determination of the social conscience of the Nation embodied in the organic law by the constitutional process, by the votes of Congressmen, Senators, and State legislators, all elected by the people, when prohibition was declared by both parties to be a nonpartisan question.

2. The question of the retention, modification, or repeal should likewise be determined by vote of the people in senatorial, congressional, and legislative elections as a nonpartisan question.

3. The responsibility of individual citizens to their country and their God for their votes in the election of President, Senators, Congressmen, and State legislators can not be evaded and can not be altered one whit by any party platform. Moral principles are always paramount to any political allegiance, just as conscience and God tower above political-party dictum and human leaders.

4. In harmony with the declaration of the general conference that in all elections from constable to President, our people should vote for men and women who believe that prohibition ought to be the law, we urge our people to meet unwaveringly the serious obligation which has been thrust upon them in the coming election for President, Senators, Congressmen, and State legislators by voting for those candidates only, who believe that prohibition ought to be the law, and by opposing openly and vigorously the proposals which have been made for modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and the weakening of the Volstead Act.

5. That our people may have clear, definite information as to the attitude on prohibition of all candidates, for President, Senators, Congressmen, and State legislators, we strongly advise that individual citizens or groups of citizens make public inquiries of all such candidates, as to their attitude on the question of modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment or the weakening of the Volstead Act or of State prohibition enforcement laws, and requesting public reply to the same. We advise that such questions be asked and answers demanded, even though candidates have already been nominated in primaries, or are without present or proposed opposition, in order that the position of such candidates may be clearly indicated upon which to base action in the present and in future elections.

PRESENT SITUATION

The situation to-day is very different from that in 1928. Then the contest revolved around the personal attitude of two candidates for the presidency on the question of prohibition. To-day, while again the personal attitude of the two presidential candidates will be involved, the platforms of the two parties are to be carefully compared and most important of all, Senators, Congressmen, and State legislators are to be chosen. Despite the furious assaults of wet fanatics, the continued false wet propaganda and the action of political-party conventions, we believe that a majority of the people of the Nation are opposed to modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and that they still believe that the best method of handling the traffic in intoxicating liquors is by branding it as criminal, which it truly is. We desire better observance of the law by the people and better enforcement by the State and National Governments, and we urge the provision by States and Nation of whatever men and money may be necessary for more efficient prohibition enforcement.

Proof of the benefit of the eighteenth amendment is evidenced by governmental records, social-welfare agencies, and other authoritative sources. The money formerly spent in saloons has since their abolition been spent not only for necessities but for comforts and pleasure. The same dime can not be spent for beer and bread. The legalization of the liquor traffic means the practical return of the saloon, for whatever method of distribution is adopted the family income will be depleted in spending for booze instead of shoes.

We are faced to-day with the practical question, Shall the wet cities with their large foreign-born population, dominated by a hybrid leadership opposed to prohibition, with a wet metropolitan press, subservient to its wet city circulation and advertisers, with millionaires spending large sums for the return of the liquor traffic, admittedly to relieve themselves of taxation by shifting it to the women and children of the homes of the poorer citizens, with groups of high-society women clamoring for cocktails, as over against the positive, unimpeachable opposition of sacrificial workers like Evangaline Booth and Jane Addams, with the sidewalks of New York, Chicago, and similar groups in other cities howling down and overpowering free speech in public representative conventions without any rebuke or protest from high educational and senatorial wet leadership; shall such groups by persistent, unfair, false propaganda and unscrupulous use of party machinery be permitted to determine the policy of our great Nation on this great moral, social question, and in a wave of unreasoning wet hysteria strike from the Constitution the greatest moral, social enactment by any nation in any age? We appeal to the manhood and womanhood of America, to the lovers of children and homes to stand unshaken and meet their responsibility, as Christian citizens, by voting for men who will refuse to remove the brand of the criminal from the traffic in intoxicating liquors. We are in the midst of a great battle in a great warfare in which warfare Methodism will not betray her consistent history, but here and now declares to all the world that in this war there will be no surrender, no retreat, no compromise.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the question of unemployment—on farms, in factories, of veterans, and many others—transcends in immediate importance all other legislative problems now before Congress. The executive council of the American Federation of Labor, meeting in Atlantic City on July 11, adopted resolutions on this issue justly and wisely urging Congress not to adjourn without adopting more fundamental legislation than any so far enacted or considered. I send to the desk an article published in the New York Times of July 13, 1932, detailing the position of federation leadership, with the request that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Manufactures and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR ASKS QUICK AID ON JOBS BY CONGRESS—AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR COUNCIL OPPOSES AN ADJOURNMENT UNTIL ADEQUATE RELIEF BILL IS ADOPTED—STRESSES "MORAL DUTY"—GREEN URGES HOOVER TO CALL CONFERENCE OF INDUSTRY TO CUT WORK TIME—FEARS CRISIS NEXT WINTER—NOTES SOCIAL UNREST AND REPORTS AVERAGE OF 23 PER CENT UNEMPLOYED IN FEDERATION TRADES

By Louis Stark

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., July 12.—The pressing problem of unemployment and unemployment relief was tackled to-day as soon as the first session of the semiannual meeting of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor got under way. Fortified by reports of widespread distress in all parts of the country and apprehensive as to the possible consequences of a mounting tide of social unrest next winter, the council declared it to be the "solemn duty" of Congress to remain in session to pass an adequate unemployment relief bill.

At the same time William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, urged that President Hoover call a national conference of industry, representing all employing interests, to consider the critical aspects of the depression and to propose plans for immediate action. Such a conference, in Mr. Green's opinion, could definitely decide on the universal readjustment of the working time in order to distribute available work among the largest number of employees.

URGES NATIONAL ACTION

"Such a conference," Mr. Green declared, "could confer the benefit of the shorter work day and shorter work week on all employees on a national basis. Some companies have established the 5-day week for their employees already. By this means they divide up all available work among their own employees, but such action by a few companies has no national effect."

He appealed to industry to act "not only on economic but on patriotic and moral grounds."

"The unemployment emergency is as great as was the war emergency. The Nation must be saved," he continued. "If we can not give our people more work at once we can divide whatever work there is available among all and so gradually bring the unemployed into the ranks of the consumers again and perhaps start the wheels of industry going."

Mr. Green pointed out that there was an average of 23 per cent of unemployment among the trades affiliated with the federation, but that in some instances, such as in the building trades, the average was 62 per cent.

* * * * * * *

"Federal funds will have to be made available for the use of relief agencies to meet the acute situation next winter, for conditions at that time will be extremely bad," he added. "Local relief agencies have broken down and many States have exhausted their resources available for relief."

Referring to the recent unemployment riots in St. Louis and Detroit, he said responsible leaders were hoping to forestall similar incidents by the prompt use of funds for relief.

COUNCIL'S VIEWS SET FORTH

He then made the following statement in behalf of the council:

"Because the unemployment problem and the distress resulting from continued widespread unemployment are so serious, transcending all other questions in importance, the executive council gave it primary immediate consideration. The need for unemployment relief extended by the Federal Government has increased since Congress convened last December. More people are unemployed and greater distress exists than early in December when Congress began its session, and for that reason the executive council expressed the opinion that Congress ought not and should not adjourn until it passes an adequate relief measure.

"In the opinion of the executive council it is the solemn duty of Congress to remain in session to pass an unemployment relief bill that will meet the demands for food, clothing, and shelter for the unemployed and those dependent upon them during the coming winter. If Congress fails to do its duty in this respect, we are of the opinion that social unrest will increase and that economic and industrial conditions will become worse.

"The executive council registers its solemn protest against the adjournment of Congress before it has passed a relief measure wholly adequate to meet the urgent demands of the acute unemployment situation which prevails throughout the Nation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Delaware is granted.

The address is as follows:

SPEECH DELIVERED BY SENATOR FELIX HEBERT OVER THE STAR RADIO FORUM HOUR AT 9.30 O'CLOCK P. M., WEDNESDAY, JUNE 13

To-night, through the courtesy of the Washington Star, I am privileged to speak on a subject of interest to most of you. I am asked to tell you about the Federal home loan bill which passed the Senate yesterday. It passed the House quite some time ago.

Perhaps one-half of my listeners own their own homes, and many others look forward to the day when they can call some house, however modest, their home.

Under present conditions many people fear that they will lose their homes, and, incidentally, the savings of a lifetime. I should like those people to listen to the message I have for them, a heartening message, I think they will agree when I am done. What I have to say will not affect the owner of an expensive home—but I do want the owner of the small, modest family home to listen to me while I tell him how Congress expects to assist him in easing his present burdens and relieving him of his anxieties.

Thousands of people who have borrowed money on their homes are having difficulty in meeting their contractual obligations. With the investors in the lending institutions withdrawing money, pressure is created which prevents the lending institutions from extending credit to the borrower. If these institutions had a source from which to secure funds on the mortgages they hold, they could assist the borrowers by carrying them along in times of depression like the present and show greater leniency as regards their mortgage payments, as well as in the payment of their taxes, their insurance premiums, and the necessary repairs.

Many homes are being lost through the calling or refusal to renew what are commonly called short-term mortgages; that is, mortgages that are not payable by installments over a considerable period of years. Owners who have never failed to pay interest charges are denied renewals and threatened with foreclosures as banks, trust companies, bank receivers, and insurance companies demand the return of their funds. For example, in 1931, 150,000 families lost their homes through foreclosures. In one city, with a population of one and one-quarter million people, the foreclosures upon homes in the year 1926 totaled 406; in 1927 there were 605; in 1928, 759; in 1929, 909; in 1930, 1,279; and in 1931, 1,555. It is believed that the operation of the home-loan bank system will remedy this situation and place at the disposal of the owner of a home valued at not more than $20,000 sufficient funds so that he can prevent foreclosure and the consequent loss of his home. To-day the people of moderate means can not borrow to tide them through the vicissitudes of unemployment and the consequent reduction of income. Reasonable credit is practically unknown. Banks are unable to make further advances upon mortgages because they are not liquid and because of the demands that come to them from their depositors for withdrawal of their deposits. Hundreds of small banks, which have made a practice of loaning on real-estate mortgages and which have closed during the present period of depression, could have maintained their activities if they had had some means of raising money upon the mortgages which they held. In the case of building and loan associations, while they have been able to carry on—because of the peculiar nature of these institutions—yet they have had to disappoint thousands of their investors because they have been unable to return their savings within a reasonable time after notice. These home-loan banks would provide for such contingencies. Let me cite you an example to show you how they would operate in a given case.

Let us assume that a building and loan association or a savings bank has invested a considerable part of its deposits in home mortgages. The depositors are calling for the return of their funds. Necessarily the bank or building and loan association needs liquid assets to meet these demands. They must find a market for their mortgages, and if unable to do so they must cease making further advances or, as the last resort, call them in for payment as they mature. The mortgagors themselves—that is, the home owners—are without funds and are unable to pay. Unless some means can be found to provide funds to meet these demands the bank will be confronted with the necessity of closing its doors and applying for the appointment of a receiver. When a receiver is appointed he must proceed to liquidate the assets of the bank. He will sell the bank's mortgages if able to find a purchaser. If unable to do so, he must foreclose, and the home owner has no means of protecting his home. Now, with these home-loan banks in operation, when a situation like that arises, this same bank of which I have been speaking applies for a loan upon its promissory note with these good mortgages as collateral. It secures the necessary funds with which to meet the demands of its depositors. In addition, where conditions justify it, it will advance additional funds to its borrowers so that they in turn may keep their mortgages current, pay their taxes, their insurance premiums, and other incidental expenses until such time as normal conditions return and steady employment enables them to proceed with their customary payments.

The Federal home-loan bank legislation had its inception at a conference called by President Hoover on November 13 last, which was attended by a large number of representatives of various organizations, including building and loan associations, cooperative associations, home-loan banks, and real-estate concerns.

The conference recognized that the need for home-mortgage discount banks had been accentuated by the present economic conditions. There are upward of fifteen billions of mortgages outstanding on small homes in the United States. Nearly eight billions of these are held by building and loan associations; the balance are held by banks, insurance companies, and private investors.

The history of mankind has shown that real estate is the basis of all wealth. Mortgages on properly improved real estate upon a valuation of 60 per cent of the property are the safest form of investment ever devised. It is a form of investment, however, which is subject to numerous handicaps.

First, it requires a knowledge of the value of real estate in each particular locality where a loan is to be made, and this information is not available to the ordinary investor. Second, real estate which is the basis of all wealth is a slow asset. In times of business depression the fact that mortgage loans are not liquid frequently works serious hardship on the home owner. When he goes to his bank to renew his mortgage he finds that the bank is pressed for cash and can not grant him an extension. Oftentimes he is unable to find the necessary funds elsewhere and the only course left for the bank is foreclosure, resulting many times in wiping out the entire equity of the home owner.

Let me outline to you the general structure of these proposed home-loan banks.

The home-loan bank system will consist of from 8 to 12 Federal home-loan banks in districts to be determined by a Federal home-loan board, consisting of five members, appointed by the President.

Building and loan associations, cooperative banks, homestead associations, savings banks, trust companies, and other banks with time deposits (except national banks), and insurance companies will be eligible for membership. The members will supply the permanent capital and they will be required to subscribe for stock equal to 1 per cent of the unpaid principal of the home mortgages held by each member, with a minimum subscription of $1,500.

The board, that is, the body representing the Federal Government which will have oversight of all the activities of these banks, will determine the minimum capital of each of them, which, however, will not be less than $5,000,000. The Government will subscribe to the original capital, but provision is made for the ultimate repayment of its entire subscription.

But, you may ask, how are these Federal home-loan banks to secure the funds to be loaned to their members? The answer is, through the issuance and sale of bonds to the general public. These bonds will be secured by the collateral which the members of the banks deposit as security for their loans, as well as by the notes of the members themselves, the collateral in every instance consisting of secure and safe real-estate home mortgages, with not less than 190 per cent of unpaid mortgage principal behind each dollar of bonds issued.

The board will prescribe rules and regulations for all bond issues and the general conduct of the banks. It has authority to approve the rates of interest to be paid by the banks upon their bonds, as well as upon the loans which they secure. The banks will be jointly and severally liable for all bonds issued by all the banks.

No Federal home-loan bank is to be permitted to transact a general banking business. Its function is confined solely to serving member institutions.

The act requires the banks to accumulate reserves at higher rates than are required in the Federal reserve system. The banks are exempt from taxation and are designated as depositories of public moneys, and their bonds are made legal investments for fiduciary, trust, and public funds.

Broad powers are given to the Federal home-loan bank board in regulating the activities of the banks and in providing for the orderly conduct of home-financing activities throughout the country. The board has powers of examination and can require periodical statements as well as examinations of Federal home-loan banks and their members. Necessary penalty clauses, etc., are provided.

There are 30,000,000 families in the United States, with 25,000,000 residential units and about 13,500,000 home owners. Extensive surveys show that home ownership has decreased in this country during the past 87 years. Thus in 1920 only 40 per cent of the families of the country owned their own homes.

Some erroneous impressions have arisen in the consciousness of many of our people as to the causes for the decrease in home ownership in the United States. For instance, in the course of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, one of the members asked a witness if he did not think the automobile had been a very strong competitor of the home. This is the reply which the witness made:

"I do not agree with you, Mr. Chairman. I think that the automobile has contributed more to home ownership than anything has that has come along. * * * It provides easy transportation out to the suburbs, * * * so that more people can live up to the old Anglo-Saxon idea of a detached house for every family."

Upon further questioning as to whether or not prior to the advent of the automobile people did not put their money into homes, whereas now the automobile and the garage have absorbed those funds, this witness, who, by the way, has made an exhaustive study of home ownership and the means to acquire homes and speaks with authority on the subject, replied that he did not agree with this proposition. He said: "It has provided cheap transportation for the second third, if I may so characterize it, of our family population, so that they could go out a distance of 2 or 3 miles where they could afford to have a home of their own; and without transportation you can never put this Nation on a basis of home ownership. The automobile has contributed that. It has opened up vastly more land for homes which people can get out in the suburbs where they can live up to this old Anglo-Saxon idea of the detached house for every family."

I should like to explain to you in detail the working of the institutions which are to become members of these Federal home-loan banks; how they have assisted home owners; how they operate; and the spirit of thrift that has been cultivated by reason of their activities, but time will not permit me to do more than refer to one of these. I have chosen for the purpose of illustration the building and loan associations, sometimes called cooperative banks, not with the idea of magnifying their importance over other institutions which have been so active and so successful in encouraging the building of homes in our country, but because of the fact that they are organized to serve the needs of the town or city where they operate, and their activities are confined to the encouragement of thrift and the financing of modest homes.

The first building and loan association was organized in this country about 100 years ago. There are now 11,777 in operation, and they are to be found in every State in the Union and in the District of Columbia. They have a total membership of more than 12,000,000 persons, of whom approximately three-fourths are what are known as investing members, and the remainder are borrowers on mortgages upon real estate. Their total assets amount to nearly $9,000,000,000, of which nearly 90 per cent is invested in mortgage loans.

The representatives of these institutions say that the home loan bill will aid them to function normally. It will do much toward salvaging homes, not so much those under mortgage in the building and loan associations, because they do not have any due date, and such mortgages are not due until they are paid off, but it will assist materially in the case of those obligations which mature on a definite date.

In the case of savings banks, particularly mutual savings banks, which have no capital stock and which pay no dividends except to their depositors, there again the volume loaned upon mortgages on real estate, particularly on modest homes, is very impressive, but these mortgages are due on a definite date.

The mutual savings banks have more than five and one-half billions invested in such securities. The stock savings banks report less than a million of this type of investment. Life-insurance companies have seven and one-half billions so invested. State commercial banks have a billion and one-half outstanding. Loan and trust companies have one and one-quarter billions; national banks, one and one-half billions; Federal land banks, more than a billion; joint-stock land banks, something in excess of one-half billion; and all other institutions, twelve billion three hundred and seventy-five million. Thus we find that the loaning of funds upon mortgages of real estate in this country is a business involving the stupendous sum of nearly $40,000,000,000 and, of course, justifies the most earnest consideration of Congress in solving the problem confronting these institutions, particularly in the present exigency.

The savings banks do not make loans in the same way that they are made by the building and loan associations. Their mortgages, for the most part, are made for a fixed term, in many instances for one year with interest payable on them every six months, and not infrequently with a provision that the mortgage shall be amortized by the payment of a certain proportion of the principal each year. These instruments become due and payable at the date agreed upon; but if interest payments are made semiannually, or as required, they are renewed until another interest period comes around, and the payment of the interest when due renews the mortgage. Instances have been known where some of these mortgages have been outstanding and have been held by savings banks for more than 20 years. In normal times the borrowers experience no difficulty, provided they are able to meet their interest payments and provided the security remains ample, but in exigencies such as those through which we are now passing, the depositors in these savings banks are calling for their deposits, and naturally the banks, wherever possible, secure the repayment of the mortgages which they hold. The borrowers are unable to secure funds though their homes may be mortgaged for only a small part of their value, and as a result the mortgages must be foreclosed, and the homes are lost to their owners.

Let me read you a letter which was made a part of the record of the hearings on this bill:

"We have worked for the past five years for our home. We have squeezed on clothes and everything possible, and by doing that we were able to pay off the second mortgage fully this year. But now, they have told us, as the first mortgage is coming due also, that we may pay $750 down now, reduce the principal that much, and add service fees and costs, which means that we must raise a total of more than $1,000, and we can not do it. We are going to lose our home. What can we do about it?"

Not all the representatives of institutions loaning money on home mortgages favor the enactment of this bill to create home-loan banks. But it may be interesting to review the attitude of the witnesses who appeared before the two committees of Congress.

Eighty-three witnesses were examined by those two committees.

Sixty-one witnesses from 22 different States appeared in behalf of the measure and 22 from 13 States opposed it.

Twenty-four representative building and loan officials from almost as many different States appeared, and 22 favored the measure and 2 were in opposition.

Bankers were evenly divided as to the desirability of the measure, six appearing for and six against.

Ten representatives of large eastern life-insurance companies, including several of their mortgage-lending agents from other parts of the country appeared in opposition to the measure.

Seventeen well-known figures in the general real-estate field appeared, 13 in behalf of the measure and 4 in opposition.

Of the 11 unclassified witnesses who appeared, 7 favored the measure and 4 were opposed to it.

SUMMARY

In order that I may not be misunderstood as to what in my opinion this proposed law would effectuate if enacted, I summarize by saying:

1. It will assist materially in relieving the present distress among home owners.

2. It will to a large degree afford a solution of the present problems with which financial institutions which have loaned on mortgages are confronted.

3. It will afford relief to literally millions of investing members in building and loan associations who are now unable to withdraw their savings to meet their immediate and pressing needs.

But it must be borne in mind that there are some very desirable ends it will not reach now, for instance:

1. It will not create unlimited funds to provide against the needs of all our citizens in distress.

2. It will not provide for the building of new homes—at least in the immediate future, though ultimately it will have that effect.

3. It has been urged that the passage of the bill will encourage building, provide employment in many industries, and revive business activity. In my opinion it will not do that until the present emergency has passed, but it will do so immediately on the return of normal conditions.

In our country the home has a significance that is peculiarly American. It is the objective of every American family. It has furnished the theme for some of the most inspiring, the most thrilling, the most beautiful sentiments in song and story. After all, the average citizen of America, from the captains of gigantic industries to the humble laborer, ever recurs to the old refrain, "Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home." Nor should we forget the love that attaches to the home of even the adolescent whose years of childhood have been spent within the sheltering walls of his modest dwelling place. Thoughtful, public-spirited citizens have long since come to the realization that there is a veritable chasm between a mere dwelling house and a home; that around the American home are clustered the fondest recollections of childhood, of youth, and of mature age, and that children of parents who own their own home are indeed blessed with a priceless heritage.

The real home, that which the mother can call "our home" and of which she is so proud, is a monument to the mutual love and devotion which it shelters. "A bit of sentiment," you say, and perhaps you are right, but American citizens have fought valiantly for their homes. Let us preserve them. They will continue to be the very foundation stone of our country.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF WAR HURLEY

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address delivered last night by Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War, may be printed in the RECORD. This is a political address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not object to the printing of the address. It is a political address. It is my purpose to take the floor when the opportunity arises and make reply to many of the erroneous statements and declarations contained in the address. I presume the policy will be resorted to of printing in the RECORD political addresses made outside the Senate. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not propose to object to this particular address being printed in the RECORD, but I wonder, if we remain in session, if we are going to continue to print all these political speeches? It is costing the taxpayers of the country hundreds of thousands of dollars. I am going to raise the question at a time when some one is not offering a particular address, because I think the Senate ought to pass upon the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am told that it costs $58 per page to print this material in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Why would it not be fair to both parties and fair to the Government if we made an agreement now that no political addresses should be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? It would bear with equal hardship and equal benefit upon both parties.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have just stated that it is my intention to reply to the address of the Secretary of War, and for that reason I do not feel that his remarks made at the Ohio State Republican convention last evening should be excluded from the RECORD.

Mr. REED. If that is done, then it is only common fairness that when some Democrat makes a political speech we should let it go into the RECORD. I think the taxpayers of the country are entitled to protest against our using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for campaign purposes. It is the same thing in connection with the use of our franks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, we have already printed in the RECORD the addresses of the nominees for President, the platforms, and numerous other political documents. The Senator did not object when the address of the chairman of the Republican National Convention was ordered printed in the RECORD.

I think perhaps there is another side to this question. The public are entitled to have presented to them the issues involved in this campaign. There is no better way of presenting them than in public addresses; and certainly it would be a strange policy now, after having let all these documents and speeches of a purely political nature go into the RECORD, and some one announces his purpose of replying to them, to say that they shall not go into the RECORD. It would be embarrassing to me to make a reply if the speech of the Secretary of War should be excluded from the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, one word more if the Senator from Idaho will permit me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The speech of Secretary Mills, which is of exactly the same nature, was also ordered printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Will not the Senator let me finish the sentence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is assuming that this discussion is taking place with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, and until the Senator from Nebraska interposes an objection the Chair will permit the discussion to proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that exactly the same question is involved in the use of our franking privilege for purely political matter or the use of our privilege of charging telegrams to the Government. It would be indefensible for us to charge a political telegram to the Government. I think it equally indefensible for us to use our franks in writing purely political letters. It seems to me this is all a piece of the same thing, and that we ought not to do it.

I did not object to the insertion of the speech of the chairman of the Republican convention, and neither did I object to the insertion of the speech of the chairman of the Democratic convention.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Nor to the speech of Secretary Mills delivered at a political meeting in Boston a few nights ago.

Mr. REED. I do not remember being present when the request was made to print that speech in the RECORD; it may have been made when I did not hear it. I should have objected if I had noticed it. We have got to play absolutely fair between the parties, but it seems to me that, sooner or later, we have got to put an end to it. If we do not adjourn to-day, and should the Senate remain in session much longer, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will simply bulge with political speeches; and I do not think that would be fair to the taxpayers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago, I shall not object to this particular speech being printed in the RECORD, because the Senator from Arkansas has said he is going to reply to it, but, if I am present, I shall object to any further political speeches being printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is granted, and the speech of the Secretary of War will be printed in the RECORD.

The speech referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. PATRICK J. HURLEY, SECRETARY OF WAR, DELIVERED BEFORE THE OHIO REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION AT COLUMBUS, OHIO, JULY 14, 1932

We, as Republicans, are assembled here to-night to consider the state of the Union, to meet squarely and courageously the serious economic conditions that for a period of years have challenged the stability of the economic system and the political institutions of the Nation. The conditions that in the past three years have caused 20 revolutions that have shaken the very foundations of other nations of the world—that have swept upon us from abroad—have caused stagnation in our commerce, maladjustments in our economic system, and dire distress among many of our citizens. Our difficulties have come in large part but not entirely from conditions that arose outside of our own border.

How are we going to restore normal conditions? How will the stream of credit and new life be infused into the prostrate body of our economic system?

Let us consider the plans for the rehabilitation of our Nation that are before the people. Let us compare the vague, indefinite suggestions of the Democratic candidate for President with the definite, logical, all-inclusive, constructive, nonpartisan reconstruction program and the accomplishments of Herbert Hoover.

We all applauded the distinguished Democratic candidate for President when he flew to Chicago to accept the nomination. The governor said he flew to break a precedent and that he intended to break every old, useless, hackneyed precedent as he came to it. He then proceeded to follow an inviolable Democratic precedent, one of the oldest and most futile precedents of his party—that of blaming all the ills of mankind upon the Republican Party and upon its leader.

The governor, of course, did not break a precedent when he approved the Democratic platform "100 per cent." The Democrats broke no precedent in holding their convention after the Republicans had held theirs. The Democrats had to find out what the Republicans were going to do before they could act. The Democratic Party has no plans nor policies of its own. It lives only by the criticism it is able to direct against the leadership and the constructive program of the Republican Party. In many essentials it always follows Republican leadership.

Governor Roosevelt's most ardent admirers regretted that his acceptance speech consisted principally of generalizations.

The part of the governor's address that intrigues us is this: "I pledge you, I pledge myself, to a new deal for the American people." He then engaged himself in some vague words about restoring America to its own people.

Just what is this new deal? The governor does not enlighten us. When he speaks of returning America to its own people, is he condemning the attempts of his late chieftain whom he idolizes, President Wilson, to give America to the League of Nations? Is he condemning the Wilson Democratic administration for having given the allied nations nearly all the money the American taxpayers owned and asking in return not even a definite promise to pay? Is he going to lift that burden that his chieftain placed on American taxpayers? Is he going to join the Republicans in their demand for repayment? Maybe the governor believes that by ceasing to advocate the entry of the United States into the League of Nations, the Democrats are giving America back to the people. That may be his new deal of which he speaks so vaguely.

The Republican Party is and has always been unequivocally opposed to cancellation of debts or entry into the League of Nations. It has been quite a task for the Republicans to overcome the international entanglements made by the last Democratic administration. We are not through with them yet.

The Republicans restored America to the American people by defeating the Wilson League of Nations, but it has not yet been able to pay off the mortgage the Democrats put on the taxpayers' pocketbooks for money to lend to Europe. Now Europe does not want to pay but our taxpayers still owe the money that the Democrats lent and are still paying interest on it.

But maybe the governor's new deal has nothing to do with international affairs. Perhaps it is purely a domestic matter. Is the new deal to create a gigantic bank reaching into every city, village, and hamlet of the country, as proposed by Speaker Garner? That is a new deal as well as a great departure from the principles fought for by Andrew Jackson. The Hoover nonpartisan reconstruction program is designed to assist, to supplement, and to uphold individual effort and enterprise, not to compete with or destroy them.

Mr. GARNER, as the vice presidential candidate, is pledged to carry out the policies of the party, and yet he proposed to violate the Democratic platform which pledged the party not to put the Government into competition with private enterprise. The Democratic platform proposed to reduce bureaucracy, yet within a week after the Democratic convention Speaker GARNER attempted to create an additional Federal bureaucracy of a hundred thousand bureaucrats.

The Democratic platform pledged the party to reduce Government expenses, yet Mr. GARNER and his Democratic colleagues in the House have passed bills that would add $4,000,000,000 to present Federal appropriations for one single year.

Is that the new deal? Any politician can devise a plan to take money out of the Treasury. No one has found a way to put money into the Treasury that does not ultimately result in increased taxes on the people.

Is the new deal to be a dole from the Federal Treasury, advocated by his fellow partisans in Congress? Is the new deal to substitute for individual effort, individual initiative, individual enterprise, some form of bureaucratic collectivism? Is it the new deal expressed in the governor's radio speech of April 7, in which he attempted to arouse class hatred among the citizens of this Republic? That's not the right kind of a new deal; the governor should know that hate never produces anything but evil.

It is very well for the governor to paraphrase the great Roosevelt, who demanded a square deal. Theodore Roosevelt told the people in Rooseveltian terms what he meant by a square deal. The governor has left us to guess what he means by a new deal.

Let us be tolerant. The governor may be honestly trying to give us a new deal, but he is certainly dealing from an old deck—the same old deck from which William Jennings Bryan gave the American people so many "new deals" and from which he dealt himself so many Democratic nominations for President—the same old deck that contains all the radical phrases, all the language of discontent, all the futile attempts to capitalize disorder and arouse class prejudices for political purposes. Beware, governor! Mr. McAdoo, Mr. Hearst, and Speaker GARNER may have stacked the deck on you.

Let us contrast the vague references of Franklin D. Roosevelt to a new deal with the accomplishments of President Hoover.

From the very beginning of the depression the President of the United States continuously has fought for the maintenance of the American standard of living. He insisted upon proper tariffs to meet the flood of cheap goods from demoralized Europe. He upheld the rate of wages. He inaugurated a program of Federal construction to stimulate industry and increase employment. He sponsored a building program by State and local governments and private industry. He stopped immigration by Executive order. He conciliated capital and labor. He prevented strikes and acrimony between employer and employee that have been the universal accompaniment of all former panics and depressions. He defeated the dole. He mobilized the public opinion to take care of distress. He directed the Farm Board to take and hold surplus until better markets could be obtained. He bolstered up confidence in the financial world and stopped the onrush of bank failures by organizing a private bank pool of $500,000,000. He extended a moratorium—which has nothing to do with the cancellation of debts—and prevented the spread of financial panic to the United States.

When the collapse in Europe became complete, the President created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

"The creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was warranted only as a temporary measure to safely pass a grave national emergency which would otherwise have plunged us into destructive panic in consequence of the financial collapse in Europe. Its purpose was to preserve the credit structure of the Nation and thereby protect every individual in his employment, his farm, his bank deposits, his insurance policy, and his other savings, all of which are directly or indirectly in the safekeeping of the great fiduciary institutions."

The President led in the organization of a movement to stimulate home building and home ownership. He urged upon Congress a plan to furnish credit to home owners and farm owners in distress. He reestablished American prestige abroad. He saved Germany from disaster. He offered a strong, far-reaching, nonpartisan program to accelerate recovery. He fought every phase of the depression as it appeared.

Depression has proved a stubborn foe. Like the multiple-headed hydra, no sooner is one head of the beast chopped off when another grows out. The President has attacked depression on a hundred fronts, but no sooner does he stop the ravages of one attack upon our civilization and our American standards of living than another assault swoops down from some other hostile sector.

His creating jobs by accelerating public construction did not solve the unemployment problem. His stopping of immigration did not give every American a job. His banking reforms did not make every bank solvent. His farm measures did not pay off the debts on every farm. His credit-expansion projects did not put every business back on its feet. Wars are not won in a single skirmish. Campaigns are not settled in a single sector. But each single battle against a definite foe, each individual assault on a stubborn hostile position, the many separate dispositions of his troops and his weapons against a definite target show that the tactics of President Hoover on the battlefront of depression saved the day, and often averted complete disaster.

The three major policies of the President stand vindicated. We have prevented disorders, riots, and social upheavals. We have cared for the needy. We are in a depression, but we have averted panic and catastrophe. The economic struggle is not over. Battles are still raging on a hundred fronts. While 20 revolutions have shaken the foundations of other nations, while nation after nation has been driven from its gold standard, the United States, under the administration of Herbert Hoover, is tranquil, solvent, and confident.

The Democrats have had no program save the vague references to a new deal. The Democratic candidate has suggested no program. The Hoover nonpartisan reconstruction program is still the only complete logical program offered by anyone in or out of public life to break this depression.

In the face of the striking evidence of the accomplishments of the Hoover administration, Governor Roosevelt, who should be thoroughly familiar with the President's program, still accuses the administration of thinking only in terms of the man at the top and totally neglecting or forgetting the man at the bottom. Such a statement can be charitably attributed to a lack of familiarity with the Hoover nonpartisan program.

The President's program touches every phase of American life, reaches every element of the depression and its causes, and offers constructive means for combating its deleterious effects upon every element of the citizenship; but it does not put the Government in competition with private enterprise. It is true that under the individualistic system success comes to those who have the capacity, who can endure and have the will to succeed. No law or regulation can supply any individual with the attributes that make for success. Why should we continuously condemn those who have succeeded if they have done so honestly.

We all realize that our present system of economics is imperfect. It is human. There is nothing human that is perfect. But with all its faults, the Government of the United States and its economic system have given more happiness to more people for a greater period of time than any other government that has ever existed.

The President's purpose from the beginning has been to meet the emergencies as they arise without destroying the fundamental principles of either our economic or political institutions.

The American people do not want any deal which would deny them the free use of their own talents in legitimate enterprise. The people want the door of opportunity left open to every boy and girl born under the American flag. They want the right for themselves and their children to compete fairly and strive honestly and to succeed according to their merits. What system would Governor Roosevelt's new deal substitute for the American system?

The American Government was never intended to order the lives and control the honorable efforts and desires of the individual. The Government was created to serve a free people to enable them to promote education, to abolish intolerance and crime, to stamp out abuse and arrogance of illegitimate power, to combat poverty, to maintain equality of opportunity, and to strive honorably for the higher ideals of humankind—invention and discovery, intellectual advancement, enrichment of the spirit, and ennoblement of the soul.

Let us come to the crux of this campaign. The fact is that since the very beginning of the Hoover administration conscientious, intelligent Democrats have supported the President in nearly all of his efforts. An element in the Democratic Party has sought continuously to capitalize the discontent that has grown out of these troublous times for political purposes. It has obstructed every plan of the President designed to promote the welfare of this Nation and its 123,000,000 inhabitants.

In its principal features the Democratic platform is a complete approval of the outstanding policies followed by the President of the United States during the last three years. If you doubt that statement, read the Democratic platform. In many instances it follows not only the tone and spirit but even the words of Herbert Hoover. There is a deadly parallel between 75 per cent of the contents of the Democratic platform and the words and policies of the Hoover administration.

It would be impossible for me to take every individual plank of the Democratic platform that contains a constructive principle and point out the great similarity of words, phrases, and ideas between them and those of President Hoover. Let me refer you to the document itself. I will take up only two of the planks with which my work has made me most familiar. I refer to matters of public economy and the question of national defense.

President Hoover began to urge the consolidating of departments and bureaus as a measure of economy in a public speech in Philadelphia in 1921, and since then he has been preaching that doctrine month in and month out. In his first message to the regular session of Congress in 1929 he included a recommendation for this purpose. He has repeatedly emphasized the point in a dozen messages, and he has used every persuasion to convince Congress of its necessity. He has repeatedly made the most explicit recommendations of specific reorganizations and consolidations. In his message to Congress on the 6th of last December he made recommendations of specific reorganizations and administration for purposes of economy. On February 17 of this year he sent a message to Congress recommending that broad authority be given to the President to abolish and consolidate Government bureaus and activities in the interest of economy. To quote but one of the many pleas of the President for economy, let me repeat the following words from his message to Congress on December 8, 1931:

"We must have insistent and determined reduction in Government expenses."

The Democratic majority in the House of Representatives has defeated these efforts at every turn. In the economy bill as passed by Congress authority was given to the President for this purpose, but it was restricted through provision that executive orders affecting such consolidations must lie before Congress for 60 calendar days during a session subject to the disapproval of the Congress. In other words, the President was given authority to make consolidations, but none of them could possibly be made effective earlier than February or March of next year, and not certainly even then.

The President asked that application of this 60-day provision be waived so he could act—the President is a man of action. Here again the Democratic majority of the House crippled this emergency authority so as to exclude from quick action bureaus and commissions expending over $500,000,000 a year. In fact, they pretended to favor consolidation and reduction of bureaucracy, but hamstrung the President in action.

The first plank in the Democratic platform is an unequivocal approval of the demands made by the President for authority to reorganize the executive departments of the Government in the interest of economy. The truth is the demand of the Democratic platform for economy in government is the baldest kind of hypocrisy, unless the plank in the Democratic platform can be taken as a direct rebuke to the Democratic House of Representatives.

Let us see how the Democratic House of Representatives acts in face of the demand by the Democratic convention for economy in government.

On May 2 the Democratic House of Representatives passed the Veterans' Bureau allowances against the President's advice for what would have amounted to $450,000,000 during the first 10 years.

On May 6 the Democratic House of Representatives voted to expand Government bureaucracy in the operation of Muscle Shoals at a cost of $100,000,000.

On June 7 the Democratic House of Representatives passed a gigantic pork barrel bill, sponsored by Speaker GARNER, calling for nonproductive works at a cost of $1,300,000,000.

On June 15 the Democratic House of Representatives passed an act calling for the immediate payment of veterans' bonus at a cost of $2,000,000,000. At this very hour the Democratic House of Representatives still has under consideration Democratic measures calling for expenditures out of the Federal Treasury of items opposed by the President that, if enacted, would cost the Government more than $500,000,000 during the next fiscal year.

If the Senate and the President would have concurred with the Democratic House of Representatives and had permitted these bills to become law, the Democrats would have appropriated $4,350,000,000 above the present Budget. In other words, instead of decreasing the present Budget by 25 per cent, as demanded by the economy plank in the Democratic platform, they have passed bills that would have doubled the cost of government.

President Hoover has been fighting raids on the Federal Treasury in an effort to reduce the cost of government, and in turn to reduce the enormous taxes upon the people. Again we repeat, "You can not squander yourself out of this depression." You can not cure the depression by raids on the Federal Treasury.

What President Hoover is now and has been asking Congress to do is—

First. To reduce the cost of government.

Second. To keep the Budget balanced.

Third. To enact into law the remainder of the President's nonpartisan reconstruction program.

The eighth plank of the Democratic platform calls for reduction in the cost of national defense. "That the people in time of peace may not be burdened by the expenditure fast approaching a billion dollars annually."

The cost of national defense is not fast approaching a billion dollars annually nor anything remotely resembling that sum. The appropriations for the Navy for 1933 are $317,583,591. The purely military appropriations for the War Department bill are $283,754,020. In other words, the accurately budgeted figures for the fiscal year 1933 show the combined cost of the Army and the Navy to be but $600,000,000. That is a mere 40 per cent, or $400,000,000 less than the misleading figures given in the Democratic platform. Just 40 per cent wrong; that's about as close to the truth as you would expect Democrats to get.

"The first necessity of our Government is the maintenance of a Navy so efficient and strong that, in conjunction with our Army, no enemy may ever invade our country."

If the recommendations the President has made to Congress and his economic plan were taken from the Democratic platform, it would have little of anything left save an appeal to class prejudices and individual cupidity and the same delightful idiosyncracies about the tariff that are frequently expressed by men who oppose the tariff for campaign purposes but always vote for it in Congress.

This country recognizes the leadership of the President. The best elements in the Democratic Party recognize that leadership. The Democratic platform acknowledges that leadership.

The people of this country will not be misled. The issues in this campaign are clearly drawn. The good sense, the judgment, the intelligence of the American people will demand a verdict in favor of economy in Government and the upholding of American principles and ideals. The champion of these principles is Herbert Hoover.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, bearing on this question——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to object.

Mr. REED. No; I did not object in this instance.

Mr. CONNALLY. The whole tenor of the remarks of the Senator was that he would object, and I concluded he really meant what he said.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will yield, the whole tenor of my remarks was to endeavor to secure an agreement on both sides of the aisle that we would join together in objecting to the printing of such matter in the RECORD.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agreed with the Senator, and was sitting here approving all he said. Then when he sat down and made no objection, I was shocked.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Arkansas has said about his desire to reply, I shall not offer any objection, although I had intended to do so. I take the position that the Senator from Idaho has taken, that, in view of the fact the Senator from Arkansas desires to reply, the speech should be printed; but if I am present, I shall join the Senator from Idaho and object to padding the RECORD further with speeches on both sides of the aisle.

In this connection, may I call the attention of the Senate to the unprecedented cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the present session of Congress? I have here a letter from the Public Printer addressed to the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, which brings the figures down to the 31st of May and compares the cost of the RECORD for the present session to that date with the long sessions of the past five Congresses. In the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress the cost was, in round numbers, $340,000 and the pages of the RECORD numbered something over 10,000; in the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress the cost was about the same; in the first session of the Seventieth Congress, while the number of pages was about the same, the cost had increased, due to the higher cost of labor. In the Seventy-first Congress, second session, the pages were about the same, being a little over 10,000 pages, and the cost was about the same as in the first session of the Seventieth Congress, or a little over $434,000; but in the present session of the present Congress, down to the 31st of May, the number of pages had increased by over 2,000, there being 12,264 pages by the end of May of this year, and the cost had gone up to over $514,000.

I shall endeavor to secure a statement of the cost down to the end of June and have it printed in the RECORD at the earliest possible date. In the meantime, I ask that the letter from the Public Printer to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1932.

Mr. ANSEL WOLD,
Clerk Joint Committee on Printing,
In care of United States Senate Post Office,

GEORGE H. CARTER,
Public Printer.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I suggest that I believe that an examination of the contents of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that a great deal of space has been taken up by the discussion of liquor and beer?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the quickening of the spirit of virtue and economy in the bosom of the Senators from Pennsylvania and Connecticut and others, and recognizing that while this political material may properly be excluded from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I state now that if the rule is to be adopted and carried out in good faith I shall not avail myself of the privileges of the floor to reply to the speech of the Secretary of War, made, of course, outside the Senate and at a political convention, and I shall consent to the adoption of the new rule at this moment. It means that partisan political discussions in the Senate are to be banned; and who is going to determine the question that a Senator is making a political argument? Who is going to hold him out of order if he transgresses the rule? The custom has heretofore prevailed of incorporating partisan political matter in the RECORD, on the theory that it contains information helpful to the public in determining campaign issues. If, however, the Senator from Connecticut, who has consumed many hours in the last few days in delivering in this body what are essentially political addresses, made in the interest of his candidacy for reelection to the Senate, will apologize for the cost he has occasioned this great Nation by printing the matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and will announce his intention not to violate the spirit of the rule that he now proposes by sending out under his frank the political addresses he has made here, I myself shall be glad to withhold political remarks in this forum and avail myself of the opportunity to express my sentiments elsewhere. It is not, however, a demonstration of great virtue for Senators to use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for partisan or personal political purposes and then declare that others who express contrary views shall be denied the privilege of having their opinions recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Now let any Senator who has the spirit to do so say that he objects to printing political matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I will refrain from saying here what I intended to say about the speech of the Secretary of War, the recent speech of the Secretary of the Treasury, and another speech by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that I had no intention of objecting to this particular speech being printed in the RECORD in view of the situation that had developed. These speeches are not only printed in the RECORD, but they are circulated through the mail at the cost of the United States Government; and I repeat that hereafter, after this particular matter shall have been disposed of, I shall undertake to keep them from going into the RECORD.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to state in justification that my observation has been that the request I made was not at all unusual; I have seen similar requests made and granted ever since I have been here and never before heard the question raised. Furthermore, I am quite certain that this speech, if any speech, is worth at least $58 a page, and the answer by the Senator from Arkansas will probably be worth as much.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. My purpose, I may say, was to make this suggestion: If I followed correctly the figures read by the Senator from Connecticut contained in the letter written by the Public Printer to the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, it is costing $45 or $50 a page to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If that be true, I do not think there is any reason or any excuse or any justification for such an enormous cost, and I shall move, at the appropriate time, that the proper committee be directed to investigate the question and report as to the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because, if the cost be as indicated, then we had better, in the interest of economy, make arrangements with private business to print the RECORD. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield for that purpose, I will make the motion now that the proper committee be directed to investigate in full and report the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator mean the Senate Committee on Printing or the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. GORE. The reason I said "the proper committee" is that I did not know whether this motion should relate to the Senate Committee on Printing or the Joint Committee on Printing. If a parliamentary inquiry is in order, I will ask as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that under the printing act of 1895 the Joint Committee on Printing has jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. GORE. Then I move that the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses be directed to investigate and report to Congress in December the cost of printing the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to submit and have presently considered a resolution directing the Joint Committee on Printing to ascertain the cost of publishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to report to the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, for the present I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, I want to indulge in just one observation.

We are within 24 hours of adjournment of this session of Congress; and to indulge in a discussion to-day about putting something in the RECORD, when the Democratic leader from Arkansas has announced that he is about to make an address, seems to me the purest poppycock. If we are going to indulge in that sort of thing, let us do it at the beginning of the next session, or it should have been done many, many months ago. To do it now is simply endeavoring to prevent something which we have not prevented before and in which apparently we have little interest.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD a speech of Mrs. Jesse W. Nicholson, president of the National Woman's Democratic Law Enforcement League and editor of the Woman Voter.

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I announce, then, that in due time I will take the floor and read this speech into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. JONES. In view of the discussion that has been had, I think I will submit a request that I intended to submit anyhow.

I agree with the suggestions that have been made with reference to printing all sorts of matter in the RECORD, and especially political matter; but I had brought with me this morning an analysis of the temperance or prohibition or liquor platforms of the respective parties by Mr. David Lawrence, the editor of the United States Daily. He makes a very impartial, nonpolitical, fair, and, I think, very clear analysis of the respective planks. I felt that we were justified in having that put in the RECORD.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object. I have already put in the RECORD a nonpolitical definition of what constitutes intoxication.

Mr. JONES. This does not define that at all. It simply analyzes the two planks in a fair, impartial way.

Mr. LONG. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD an article by Ben Wand, editor of the Southern Lumber Journal, Jacksonville, Fla., entitled "What's the Answer?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Southern Lumber Journal, July, 1932]

WHAT'S THE ANSWER?

By Ben Wand, Editor

What is the answer to our present economic plight as presented by the spectacle of nearly 10,000,000 men out of work and with no work in sight? What can be done during the next six months to put these men back to work, and how can they and their families be fed, clothed, and sheltered in the meantime?

Here is the great national problem. Besides this problem all other political and social problems pale into insignificance.

Why have Government and industry come to such a sorry pass that men and women, willing to work, can not find an opportunity to work? Is our democratic form of government and our social order a colossal failure? Must we look to communism to find an answer? God forbid—but an answer must be found. Either Government and industry must find a way to give employment to workers or we shall eventually develop a new social order.

The higher the development of society, of civilization, the more dependent is each individual upon the welfare of his neighbor. That goes alike for the wealthy and the poor, the educated and the illiterate. From the marts of Wall Street to the far reaches of western farms we are all dependent upon the prosperity of each other.

The values of stocks, of bonds, or real and personal property of all kinds have been destroyed. This has come about because the purchasing power of the masses has been destroyed.

Men do not agree as to the causes which brought about this condition, but we can all agree that the condition exists. What, then, is the answer? How can purchasing power and consequent prosperity be restored?

We can vision but one answer. That answer is for all basic industries to put additional men and women to work by shortening the working day and the working week.

The Owens-Illinois Glass Co. has set an example for other industries to follow. It has adopted the 6-hour day, with 4 shifts daily, for its 13 great plants. The object is to spread available work among the maximum number of employees. There will be no reduction in the hourly rate of pay, but each shift will work 7 days weekly, thus providing 42 hours of labor weekly for each employee. The adjustment of working hours will enable the company to increase its force considerably without increasing pay-roll disbursements.

Nation-wide adoption of the 6-hour-day shift by major industries would put three or four million men to work even on the present basis of curtailed production. And what a difference that would make for all business and for those now unemployed! When men have jobs they spend what they make. And the spending of this money necessitates immediate increase of production of all commodities to meet their demands, which in turn puts other millions to work.

The selfishness of industry, the greed of those who persisted in increasing production year by year, and forcing their products on an installment-buying public, have brought us to our present undesirable economic state. That and the mechanical improvements of science designed to reduce the number of those employed. The only answer, then, lies in controlled production and the increase of employment by national adoption of a shorter working day. There appears no other answer.

NEBRASKA POWER CO.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in the course of remarks in the Senate on May 30 last respecting the power industry, its prosperity during this period of depression, and its flotation of inflated securities, I cited the example of the Nebraska Power Co. supplying electrical energy in Omaha, Nebr., Council Bluffs, Iowa, and the immediate vicinity. This company is a subsidiary of the American Power & Light Co. I then stated that American Power & Light had acquired the 1,000,000 shares of common stock of the Nebraska Power Co. at a cost of $766,000. This was based upon the testimony of Mr. Paul Anderson, of the Federal Trade Commission, presented to the Senate in connection with the remarks of my colleague [Mr. NORRIS] on July 2, 1930, and to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD beginning on page 12269 of volume 72, part 2.

It now appears that this cost of $766,000 was merely the apparent cost. The fact is that not only did this 1,000,000 shares of stock represent no cost to American Power & Light, but its acquisition was accompanied by huge profits, as set forth in a recent letter from the Federal Trade Commission.

This letter in effect states that from 1917 to 1930, $6,098,892 in dividends on common stock and $451,922 in dividends on preferred stock, or a total of $6,555,814, was paid to American Power & Light, representing income on securities which had cost the American Power & Light nothing.

In addition, $1,765,327 was paid to American Power & Light in commissions, fees, and so forth. Moreover, the Electric Bond & Share Co., of which American Power & Light is subsidiary, and its wholly owned subsidiary, the Phoenix Construction Co., collected an additional $1,062,958 from Nebraska Power Co. as fees, commissions, and interest during the same period, making a grand total of $9,379,099, paid largely on account of stock that had cost the holding company nothing.

Mr. President, I ask consent to insert in the RECORD the letter referred to in the course of my remarks; also the table referred to in that letter, and excerpts from testimony given by Walter Meleen in reference thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, June 21, 1932.

Hon. R. B. HOWELL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HOWELL: Yesterday Mr. Meleen, one of the commission's examiners, agreed to furnish you with a copy of a statement computed from commission's Exhibits 5034 and 5038, which shows amounts paid to the American Power & Light Co. and the Electric Bond & Share Co. by the Nebraska Power Co. from June 1, 1917, to December 31, 1930, for various services. A copy of that statement is inclosed herewith.

The statement shows that from 1917 to 1930, $6,098,892.33 in dividends on common stock and $451,921.55 in dividends on preferred stock, or a total of $6,550,813.88, was paid to American Power & Light Co., with offices in New York, which represented income on securities which cost the holding company nothing; and $1,765,327.36 was paid that company in commissions, fees, etc., and that, in addition, Electric Bond & Share Co. and its wholly owned subsidiary, Phoenix Construction Co., collected $1,062,957.66 from Nebraska Power Co. as fees, commissions, and interest during that same period, making a grand total of $9,379,098.90.

In the case of Electric Bond & Share Co., the exact profit on service fees can not be stated, due to the fact that the question of this commission's right to examine the operating-expense ledgers and supporting documents has not yet been decided by the courts; however, as shown in Senate Document No. 92, parts 23 and 24, page 409, the per cent of profit based upon cost is not less than 105 per cent.

Very truly yours,

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
FRANCIS WALKER,
Chief Economist.

Walter Meleen was recalled as a witness and testified further as follows:

DIRECT EXAMINATION

By Mr. Healy:

Q. Mr. Meleen, at pages 19 to 20 of your report, Commission's Exhibit 5038, there were certain data relative to shares of stock held by directors of the Nebraska Power Co. and the returns to those directors by way of dividends on those shares. I understand you wish to supplement this statement by a further statement.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You may make that further statement.—A. During both 1929 and 1930 there were nine local Omaha business men and one Chicago banker, formerly of Omaha, acting as directors of Nebraska Power Co. Nine of the ten held 5,000 shares each and one 2,000 shares of common stock, which, as already explained in Exhibit No. 5038, they had been allowed to purchase at the equivalent of 50 cents a share, making an investment on 5,000 shares of $2,500. In 1929 dividends were paid of $1.30 per share, which in the case of 5,000 shares amounted to $6,500, or a return of 260 per cent. In 1930 dividends were paid of $1.20 per share, and amounted to $6,000 on 5,000 shares, or a return of 240 per cent.

In addition to the 10 directors mentioned above, there were 6 others who were allowed similar privileges as the 10. These were as follows:

Two officers of Nebraska Power Co., 5,000 shares each.

Two directors of Citizens Power & Light Co. (of Council Bluffs, Iowa), 5,000 shares each.

One director of Citizens Power & Light Co., 2,000 shares.

One director of Citizens Power & Light Co., 1,250 shares.

The four directors of the Citizens Power & Light Co., a subsidiary of Nebraska Power Co., were local Council Bluffs business men.

Q. Now, I wish you would return to page 166 of the report. From January 1, 1918, to December 31, 1922, did the American Power & Light Co. have a contract for the management and supervision of the Nebraska Power Co.?—A. It did.

Q. What was the compensation received during this period by the American Power & Light Co. under this contract?—A. The compensation received during this period was $2,500 per year, plus 1½ per cent of gross receipts, exclusive of receipts for power sold to and dividends received on the stock of Citizens Gas & Electric Co., its subsidiary.

Q. From January 1, 1923, to December 31, 1928, with whom was the management contract?—A. Electric Bond & Share Co.

Q. What was the compensation received during this later period from Nebraska Power Co. by the Electric Bond & Share Co.?—A. Two per cent of the first $1,000,000 of annual gross earnings, 1.9 per cent of the next $2,000,000 of annual gross earnings, 1.8 per cent of the next $4,000,000 of annual gross earnings, and 1.7 per cent of the next $6,000,000 of annual gross earnings, and 1.6 per cent of all over $13,000,000 annual gross earnings.

Q. In computing the fee were all intercompany transactions between the Nebraska Power Co. and the Citizens' Gas & Electric Co. eliminated?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In 1918 the gross earnings were how much?—A. The charge on which the fee was computed amounted to $1,826,507.33.

Q. And the fee paid American Power & Light Co. was how much?—A. $29,897.61.

Q. In 1922 the gross earnings on which the fee was computed were how much?—A. $3,185,134.

Q. And the fee paid was how much?—A. $50,277.01.

Q. That was the last year in which fees were paid to the American Power & Light Co., as I understand you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In 1923 the fee was paid to Electric Bond & Share Co.?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it amounted to how much?—A. $67,298.28.

Q. And that same year the gross earnings on which the fee was computed had increased to what sum?—A. $3,516,626.67.

Q. In 1928 the fee paid Electric Bond & Share Co. was how much?—A. $92,486.52.

Q. The gross earnings of the Nebraska Co. on which these fees were computed amounted to how much?—A. $4,915,917.78.

Q. The total fees paid during the period 1918 to the end of 1928, both inclusive, were how much?—A. $669,665.58.

Q. You have prepared a table, have you not, which shows the fees year by year during this period?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the amount of gross earnings in each year on which the fees were computed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It appears, does it not, that the gross earnings increased every year?—A. That is correct.

Q. And the fee likewise increased, because the fee was based on a percentage of the gross earnings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The information you have given me in this connection this morning is contained in a sheet which you have produced here?—A. Yes, sir.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4574) to extend the provisions of the national bank act to the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4712) authorizing the sale of certain lands no longer required for public purposes in the District of Columbia, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COAL MINING IN ALASKA—MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, about 40,000 tons of bituminous coal are mined in Alaska annually along the Alaska Railroad. About 35,000 tons of this coal are used by the Alaska Railroad. There are two mines that have been supplying this coal. Both mines are subject to flooding. Under the present law the Secretary of the Interior must advertise for bids for coal, and the company bidding the lowest price receives the award or contract for the entire tonnage of 35,000 tons. There not being enough additional bituminous coal used in Alaska to keep the mine which is unsuccessful in this bidding occupied, it is shut down. It begins to flood; and unless the mine is kept in condition for subsequent operation, when bids for coal are asked the next year there is no competitor.

The Secretary of the Interior requests that he be given authority to buy this 35,000 tons of coal practically by negotiation, so that he may divide the purchases between the two mines and keep them both operating, so that there are competitors for the business of supplying coal to the railroad. At any time if the price of this coal, through cooperation of the two companies, should exceed a fair price, the Secretary of the Interior would be able to open a Government mine that has been closed for some time and supply the needs of the Alaska Railroad.

In accordance with the request of the Secretary of the Interior, a bill on the subject was introduced in both the House and the Senate. The bill first passed the House, came to the Senate, and was referred to the committee appointed to investigate the Alaska Railroad. This committee deemed it an advantage to the Secretary to have attached to this bill a limitation of the price that could be paid for coal; and it so amended this bill, and the bill went back to the House.

We then learned that the House had previously rejected such an amendment; and realizing that the Secretary of the Interior now, at the expense of the Government, is pumping one of those mines to keep it in order so that it can compete at the next letting of contracts for coal, and that this expense might keep up all summer, the committee to which this bill was referred, and which recommended this amendment, directed me to take steps to have the bill returned to the Senate, the amendment eliminated, and the bill passed as it was passed in the House.

Mr. President, I heretofore made a motion for the return of this bill, and it is now on the table of the Senate. I now ask unanimous consent for reconsideration of this bill, as it is really of importance and should pass, involving as it does only 35,000 tons of coal; and I feel that this request should be granted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Government of the United States a few years ago entered upon an unsound and a mistaken policy in the construction of a railroad in Alaska. It has continued that unsound policy at great expense, resulting in the operation of the railroad. So far as I can learn, there seems to be a purpose to continue the operation by the Government of the United States of a railroad in Alaska.

When the project was first launched, the population of Alaska was greater than it is to-day. The progress in the development of Alaska, slow as it was, was greater than it has been since the construction and operation by the United States of a railroad there. That railroad has involved us in considerable expense. I do not know the aggregate amount. I did at the last session of Congress, but I do not recall what the aggregate amount of expense is to date. At any rate, it goes into the millions of dollars.

My understanding was that the committee of which the able Senator from Nebraska is a member, if not the chairman, had made a report which contemplated in the near future the disposition of the railroad by the Government, so that it might be operated by private owners instead of by the Government; but it looks as though we have a chain around our necks. This railroad is chained to the Federal Government, and we are destined to operate it for an indefinite period at increasing costs, or, at least, if not presently increasing costs, they will increase in the future, because the road will need replenishment, new engines, new cars, new tracks. In my opinion, steps should be taken to get rid of this incubus.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the committee to which the able Senator from Utah has referred has given much attention to this railroad. When the committee was appointed, the deficit in connection with the operation of the railroad amounted to about a million dollars a year. The committee, after investigation, made certain recommendations respecting the operation of this road; and I am pleased to say that this year the deficit in operation will be only about $250,000. There is also appropriated $200,000 additional for capital expenditures that are necessary, making a total of $450,000.

Mr. President, I believe that with attention to this railroad the cost of operation may be reduced and the business increased until operation will no longer result in a deficit. This measure is a step in the right direction. We are continuing to give attention to the road. Reports are being made to this committee, and I can assure the Senator from Utah that every effort will be made to place the railroad upon a self-sustaining basis; and, with the support of Congress, that can be done, in my opinion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not, of course, criticizing the Senator from Nebraska, but I have heard that statement before, perhaps not from him, but from others who have claimed some familiarity with the matter. The claim has been made that the railroad would be self-supporting. When the project was first inaugurated it was stated that it would soon be self-supporting. But the fact is that the traffic upon the road is diminishing rather than increasing. I think the Government should dispose of this road. There is a similarity between this enterprise and the operation of ships by the Government since the war. I insisted then that they be disposed of. We could have sold the greater part of our immense tonnage for $50 a ton cash, and taken notes for the residue. We refused to do that. It was said the Federal Government must operate the ships and we lost millions upon millions, as much as $50,000,000 a year for some time, in the maintenance and operation by the Government of merchant ships. They have now diminished in number. The capital invested has been lost. Four billion dollars involved in the construction and operation may be charged to profit and loss. As most Government operations involved losses, so the Alaska Railroad and the operation of merchant ships involved losses.

I shall not object to the request of the Senator, because perhaps it is an exigency and demands consideration; but I give notice to the committee, and to my able friend, that I shall oppose any further appropriation for the Alaska Railroad, and I shall offer a bill, if no one else does, and at the December session of the Congress calling for the sale of this railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. This will not displace the motion which has been offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a transaction by unanimous consent, and will not displace the regular order.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the bill was passed is reconsidered. It will now be necessary to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was engrossed and the bill read a third time. Without objection, that vote is reconsidered. It will also be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and, without objection, that vote is reconsidered.

The question is now on agreeing to the amendment which was hitherto agreed to, and the Senator from Nebraska asks that the amendment be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on reading the bill a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REQUEST TO PRINT ARTICLE IN THE RECORD

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request. In World's Work for March and April there is an article entitled "My Brother and I," by William Preston Beazell. I ask unanimous consent to print the article in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator was present when there was discussion this morning about putting a lot of material in the RECORD. Most everything was objected to. Will the Senator tell us how long the article is?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator on my left, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], asks me also what it is about. I will answer both questions.

The article occupies five or six pages in the March issue of World's Work, and the conclusion of the article is in the April issue. The title is "My Brother and I," as I said before. The Senator from Washington asks me what it is about, and I will say in reply that it is an article about Andrew Mellon and the Andrew Mellon fortune.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, might it be held to be in the nature of political propaganda?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not say so. I am not aware of any understanding having been entered into. I do not want to violate any such agreement, I will say to the Senator. If an agreement has been entered into in my absence, I will abide by it, of course.

Mr. McNARY. No agreement was entered into. A few observations were made.

Mr. NORRIS. I present the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. Will not the Senator let it go over for the present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

CALLING OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF REPUBLICAN CABINET MEMBERS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is apparent that no action can be taken regarding the merger bill which it is moved shall be brought before the Senate for consideration. In the event a conference report is brought to the Senate and is ready to be presented before I have finished my remarks, it will please me to suspend to take up the conference report, because I think we all realize the necessity for finishing the work of this session as quickly as possible.

The "three musketeers" of the Hoover administration are the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture. They scoff at the proposal of the great nominee of the Democratic Party for President that the American people be given a new deal. Do these "three musketeers" insist on playing the game with marked cards?

Plainly, there is a widespread demand for a change in the political policies of our Government. Every possible effort is being made by these Cabinet members to discredit the Democratic platform and the Democratic candidates. They go forth by day and by night, to partisan meetings, to Republican State conventions, and deliver bitter partisan addresses, cause or permit them to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and attempt, while neglecting their official duties, to influence and control the judgment and action of the electors of this Nation.

With a deficit of $2,900,000,000 in the Treasury, as declared by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, with a new tax bill to be administered, with questions pertaining to the national finances constantly and continuously being presented, one would think that Secretary of the Treasury Mills would have enough to do to stay at his post of public duty and discharge his official responsibilities, without abandoning and neglecting his duties to participate in a partisan political campaign. Of course the Department of Agriculture is probably just as well off with its head, Secretary Hyde, absent from his post as if he were present in the Capital. [Laughter.]

All of these Cabinet members, I believe, at least two of them, have denounced the Democratic nominee for Vice President, and in efforts to arouse prejudice have declared that he is the champion of a policy to put the United States Government into private business. What will the people of the Nation think of such a declaration when it is made clear that every measure suggested or promoted by the Hoover administration for the relief of the unusual conditions that prevail has been to put the United States Government to operating in a sphere which by common consent has heretofore been regarded as properly occupied by private citizens and private industries?

THE GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS

These speakers all boast of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a monumental achievement on the part of the Hoover administration, and yet there is not a Senator who hears me nor a citizen who will read my address who does not realize that every activity of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation belongs in normal times to the sphere of private business. Am I mistaken in that assertion? If so, let some one better informed than your speaker rise now and point out the error. The Government habitually does not finance banks. Banks procure their loans in normal times from private sources. The Government usually does not lend its credit to railroads. It has done so in times of emergency. Railroads usually are expected to find their financial assistance in private sources. The Government ordinarily does not make loans to farmers. It has been compelled to do so by reason of the extraordinary and discouraging situation which confronts almost every man who earns his living by toiling in the field.

When reference is made either expressly or by implication to the proposal that all persons and all industries be given equality of treatment, any criticism fairly applicable is not based on principle but based on difficulty of administration. There is no one here who will say it is sound governmental principle to use the credit or resources of all the people for the benefit of a few of the people. The President thought enough of the proposal that the Government make loans to private industry to come down to the Senate and personally deliver a message urging that that be done. So that, I repeat, the difference between the two proposals is that the President's proposal discriminated in favor, necessarily, of a few established industries. There is no one here who thinks that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make loans without discrimination to all established private industries. Necessarily there is involved in any proposal to make loans of that character a policy of discrimination—the use of the funds of all the people for the assistance of a few of them. Admittedly the problem of administering the act so as to make loans to every applicant offering adequate security is exceedingly difficult to solve.

When these "three musketeers," with rattling sabers and flashing armor, go forth to proclaim the policies and wisdom of the administration and criticize the Speaker, let them remember that he advocated equality of treatment and that they insist upon partiality of treatment, and that the real difficulty in the Speaker's proposal was a matter of administration and not of principle.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S REFORESTATION PLAN

Secretary Hyde and Secretary Mills ridiculed, or attempted to ridicule, the proposal of the Democratic nominee, Mr. Roosevelt, that reforestation be used as a means of relieving in part unemployment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice on the desks of some Senators a little pamphlet that is being distributed over the country, part of a great propaganda to raise money to reforest Palestine. It is proposed to plant a forest over there called the "George Washington Forest." The latest report from the Department of Agriculture, I understand, is that Secretary Hyde intends to take a day off from his labors here, go to Palestine, and plant all of those trees in one day. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes; plant trees in Palestine and, as Secretary Hurley said last night, "Save Germany," but leave our forest lands unused and our own country neglected and overburdened. Do not misunderstand me. I do not pose as an authority on forestation, but from what I have read of Secretary Mills's views and those of the Secretary of Agriculture on the subject, I am vain enough to assert that I know more about the subject than either of them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to compliment himself by that statement, either, does he? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the statement of the Senator from Louisiana is correct. It is a polite way of saying that while the Secretary of Agriculture is the head of the Forestry Service of the United States and presumed to have some familiarity with the subject, he is pathetically uninformed respecting it, and I propose to prove it, not by any application of scientific principles but by summoning to the consciousness of Senators facts that will be readily admitted and easily comprehended.

These "three musketeers," when they go forth again rattling their sabers for the blood of Democrats, will do well to bear in mind that in ridiculing the Democratic nominee they have invited to his support thousands of citizens of the country who realize that forestation or reforestation is a subject of vital importance not alone to the millions who live now but to generations which are to come after us.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his eagerness to discredit the great nominee of the Democratic Party, Governor Roosevelt, made a statement which discloses surprising ignorance touching the subject of forestry. He said:

> One man can plant something near a thousand trees per day. One million men therefore could plant about one billion trees in a day. Suppose there were 300,000,000 seedling trees available, a million men could plant them in about three hours.

That is a declaration from a Cabinet officer in the Hoover administration, a Cabinet officer charged with responsibility touching the great business of agriculture and touching the subject of forestry. Certainly there are several ways of planting and transplanting trees. Anyone, not necessarily a Cabinet officer or a Senator, but anyone of ordinary intelligence—yes, anyone of sufficient intelligence to be responsible for his conduct—knows that the Secretary's declaration is absurd. If the Secretary did not make it in ignorance, he is the more to be criticized for attempting to deceive the American public by misrepresentation of the facts.

To prepare the ground, dig the holes, and properly plant trees is a task that can not be performed at the rate of 125 trees per hour by an individual; and if there is anyone who hears my declaration who doubts its correctness, if there is anyone here who thinks he can plant two trees a minute so that they will grow, he ought to be out of the United States Senate and in a sphere where he can accomplish some good. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. He ought to go to Palestine with Hyde.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. Well, I do not choose to determine where he ought to go.

That is the basis upon which Secretary Mills and Secretary Hyde both ridicule the Democratic candidate for President of the United States.

Mr. President, the subject of reforestation is of great importance. A few years ago this country possessed what appeared to be unlimited forest resources. During the last 25 years those resources have been consumed, destroyed, or wasted, until one of the great problems now facing our country is to provide industry and citizens with the timber resources essential to enable them to carry on their normal activities.

A tree is not a thing to be mocked at. It is a thing of beauty and of value. "Only God can make a tree"; but human hands, guided by reasonable intelligence, can plant trees and cause them to grow; and, without regard to the efforts to discredit the Democratic nominee and to belittle his proposal, let it be remembered that the planting of trees is a practical means of employing many of our citizens and an activity that will result in great benefit, both private and public.

PROGRAM OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The Secretary said that he desired to make a comparison of the definite, logical, constructive, and all-inclusive—and, I think, he might have added the inexplicable and incomprehensible—plans of President Hoover with the plans of Mr. Roosevelt. He has also declared that the Democratic Party has no program.

Mr. President, believing that "a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power," the Democrats in convention at Chicago said, in a few plain words, what they proposed to do if successful in the approaching election.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I just wanted to suggest at this point that more than a quarter of a century ago Theodore Roosevelt anticipated an approaching famine in the timber resources of our country and undertook to take steps to prevent it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but there is a wide breach between a Theodore Roosevelt Republican and a Hoover Republican. [Laughter.] Do not forget that, my friend.

When the Secretary made the declaration that the Democrats have no program he perhaps was indulging in the license usually enjoyed by a partisan political speaker; but the Democrats have a program, and it is definite and clearly stated. One can not say that much of the Republican program, either that of the present administration or that enunciated in the platform upon which the Republican Party is making its campaign this year.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

The Democrats, among other things, declared for "the spread of employment by a substantial reduction in the hours of labor, the encouragement of the shorter week by applying that principle in Government service," and for "advance planning of public works." That in itself is a program well worthy of support by the American people in this time when almost 10,000,000 workers are out of employment.

The Democrats advocate, too, "unemployment and old-age insurance under State laws." I know it may be said that by the declaration in the platform this is not a matter to be determined by national legislation, but there is or should be a measure of coordination between the State and the National policies of a political party, and this is a declaration in favor of a great forward step in the matter of providing for the unemployed and for those who, by reason of old age, are unable to secure employment or to earn a living by employment. Of course, one can readily understand that the Secretary of War would not look with favor on that declaration, but it is nevertheless part of an important program.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

With respect to agriculture, I shall have somewhat to say on that subject before concluding my remarks, particularly with reference to what I believe is the failure of the present administration to accomplish anything of substantial benefit in behalf of farmers. The Democratic program is for the—

> Better financing of farm mortgages through recognized farm-bank agencies at low rates of interest on an amortization plan, giving preference to credits for the redemption of farms and homes sold under foreclosure.

Extension and development of the farm cooperative movement and effective control of crop surpluses—

And so forth. Certainly this program with respect to financing farm mortgages presents difficulties; certainly the problem will not be easily worked out; but it is, nevertheless, a proposal of vital interest and concern to almost one-half the population of the United States, and it is part of the Democratic program.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Secretary ridicules the declaration in the Democratic platform concerning national defense, declares that it is based on the ignorance of the framers of the platform, who said that the cost of national defense was rapidly "approaching a billion dollars annually." He asserted that the cost under the Army and Navy appropriation bills this year aggregated about $602,000,000 and that there was therefore a 40 per cent error in the platform declaration.

It must be remembered that these bills do not carry all the items which are properly associated with the subject of national defense. It must be remembered that during recent administrations the expenditures have been rapidly increasing. It should also be recalled that in times like this the burden is difficult to bear. While the Democrats have declared for maintaining the national defense, they believe that reductions can be made in expenditures, and I have not the slightest doubt that the Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], recognizes that to be true.

SUPERVISION OF SECURITY OFFERINGS

The Democratic program declares for the—protection of the investing public by requiring to be filed with the Government and carried in advertisements of all offerings of foreign and domestic stocks and bonds true information as to bonuses, commissions, principal invested, and interests of the sellers.

This is no trivial recommendation. It is important. We all recall what happened on exchange in 1929. It is comparable to those incidents in history known as the Mississippi Scheme, the South Sea Bubble, and the tulipomania.

It will be recalled that John Law, Scotch fugitive from justice, repairing to France, became the friend and companion of the regent, the Duke of Orleans; that he established a bank. The strange thing is that the original plan of John Law is regarded by many financiers of this day as sound. But under the influence of the regent and pressure from the public, he issued too much paper money, offered to sell stocks in what is known as the Mississippi Scheme, and, amazing as it may appear, wealthy persons in France and poor citizens of France made every possible sacrifice to buy the John Law stock. He established himself in a public place. It became the center of all social and political activity in the great French capital. Men and women were so eager to buy these stocks at a thousand times their actual value that they fought and trampled one another to death in the streets. When the scheme exploded it took France almost an entire generation to recover from it.

About the same time there occurred in England what is known in financial history as the South Sea Bubble, a scheme originated to finance warrants or debts due members of the army and the navy. It grew in popularity until the scene in Paris was repeated. Thousands of Englishmen who wanted something for nothing raced with one another in efforts to buy the stock. Fortunes were made overnight; but when the bubble exploded it took England almost a generation to recover from the speculation.

Queerest of all is the tulipomania, an incident in Dutch financial history.

Prior to the Mississippi Scheme and the South Sea Bubble some one took tulip bulbs into Holland, and the Hollanders began to grow them. They became amazingly popular. Tulip exchanges were established, to the almost complete exclusion of all other forms of exchange. Notaries public became known as tulip notaries. A gentleman or a lady in society who could not display a choice tulip bulb, which looked almost exactly like an onion, a tulip bulb that cost from two to five thousand dollars in our money, could not lay claim to prominence, either social or political. Thousands of persons sold their homes and invested the proceeds in tulip bulbs. [Laughter.] This is no jest. It is historic.

The day came when some one began to sell tulip bulbs, and the market began to decline, and in a little while it found a very low level. What happened? Dealers went to the Dutch Government and asked Holland to stabilize the market of tulip bulbs, and the government attempted to do it; but in a little while it became apparent that such a thing was impossible, and so thousands of investors lost their fortunes.

A similar thing happened in the United States, climaxing in 1929.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. If I may be pardoned by my eminent friend for strengthening his suggestion when he said it must not be thought that this is a jest, referring to the financial and general conditions as he has described them with reference to bulbs in Holland, I recall to his mind, if there be those who think his observations a jest, that they will find the matter discussed in a romance by Alexandre Dumas known as the Black Tulip, where all that the eminent Senator is now referring to is set forth, but with details far more harrowing than those he could give in the short time his speech may allow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President; the tulipomania is an authentic incident in human history.

Mr. GORE. In 1636.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In 1634 and immediately following. It is comparable to what happened on the New York Stock Exchange and other exchanges in 1929.

You will recall that poor people, or people with very limited means, made investments in stocks—stocks that had very little earning power, but which, for some magical or mysterious reason, were constantly mounting in market value.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit just one remark there?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I notice that the Senator compares the stock-exchange disaster of 1929 to the bubble and bulb disasters of foreign countries. In this instance, however, it was a matter of water. There was neither bubble nor bulb.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, Mr. President, I think the comparison is accurate. Stocks that had no earning power, or little earning power, sold for enormous prices, and the prices kept rising for a time; and when they rose, speculators made enormous profits. Bonds could not be sold in those days. Real estate began to decline comparatively in value. Enterprise found no support. Commodity prices began to fall, because all financial resources were being concentrated in speculation; and at last, just as in the three amazing cases I have cited, the price began to decline, because people began to come to their senses.

And how was this extraordinary and unreasonable value of stocks brought about? Partly by that spirit of speculation, that desire to procure something for nothing, which occasionally has manifested itself among civilized peoples throughout the centuries. But from the President of the United States down, officials of this Government under the Coolidge administration encouraged this spirit of speculation, asserted that prices of stocks were not too high, and prompted thousands to pour the savings of a lifetime into a hole that had no bottom; and when the decline began, it gathered volume. Investors or speculators were seized with fear. They disposed of their stocks as rapidly as possible. Many found their holdings pledged to secure debts—pledged at values which never had any sound basis upon which to rest—and when the market value declined below the hypothecated value, foreclosures resulted. Millionaires became paupers, and citizens who thought themselves well to do were forced to face a gray dawn in which they realized that with earning power diminished they were driven to the necessity of starting life anew.

The administration, by its policy and by its announcements, and by permitting banks to make speculative loans—loans to promote speculation—brought about this condition, and is responsible for it.

Secretary Hurley said last night that world conditions were the controlling factor. I say to you that the primary influence was the unrestrained, unreasonable speculation, and that it was encouraged and assisted by the administration of the party for which Secretary Hurley assumes to be spokesman.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to the Senator that this Government contributed to world disturbance, and that the Federal reserve system alone had loaned $2,000,000,000 of its resources to European speculators.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the same spirit that destroyed the fortunes of the poor seemed to animate the Government or its officers, and threatened the foundations of big business.

The Democratic program which Secretary Hurley and Secretary Mills deride demands not only supervision of bank transactions in stocks and foreign securities, so that never again during the passing of the years, while the Democratic Party is in power, can the disgraceful debacle of 1929 in the stock market be repeated, but it goes farther than that. The Democratic program says that the instrumentalities which the United States creates in the form of banks can not employ their resources for speculative purposes.

One man who has achieved more in bringing about that feature of the program than any other does me the honor to listen to what I say. I refer to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Since he began the fight on that proposition he has been compelled to encounter the forces of criticism and wrath from financiers who have indulged in practices which ought never to have been engaged in, and who wish still to have the opportunity to use the resources entrusted to them for purposes that are not within sound principles of banking. That is a part of the Democratic platform and program, and I would like to hear the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury deride that purpose, that feature, before an audience of American citizens.

REGULATION OF POWER COMPANIES

Mr. President, the Democratic platform declares for the "regulation to the full extent of Federal power of holding companies which sell securities in interstate commerce; the regulation of rates of utility companies operating across State lines," and regulation of exchanges trading in securities and commodities.

As a part of the era of wild speculation which I have described there came a time of overcapitalization. Great companies watered their stock several times and sold it at prices far exceeding actual value, and they found abundant investors. They based their rates for service on the watered stock in many instances.

The Democratic program is to regulate and restrain such methods in the interest of the public. I would like to hear one of the "three musketeers" deride that program.

Already reference has been made to the subject of better bank supervision and the restriction of Federal reserve banks in permitting the use of Federal reserve facilities for speculative purposes.

CANCELLATION OF DEBTS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Another feature of this program is contained in the following declaration:

> We oppose cancellation of the debts owing to the United States by foreign nations.

There is nothing ambiguous in that declaration. Is any comparable provision to be found in the Republican platform? The Chicago Republican convention was as silent as the tomb on the subject. Republicans tell us that they are opposed to cancellation, and in his speech last night Secretary Hurley actually impliedly charged that the Democratic candidate for President is in sympathy with the cancellation of foreign debts. There is no foundation whatever for the statement. The platform is plain and unequivocal, and the Democratic candidate said he accepted it 100 per cent. The platform which Mr. Hurley champions contains no declaration on the subject.

DEFICITS OF HOOVER ADMINISTRATION

Now, I digress for a moment to refer to one of the statements made in the beginning of Secretary Hurley's address, the glorification of the policies and measures of the Hoover administration.

Mr. President, I think it is not unjust to say that the Harding administration goes down into history as an era of graft and corruption.

I think it is not untrue to declare that the Coolidge administration was a time of mergers, consolidations, and overcapitalization, which in themselves have contributed in some degree to the conditions which now prevail.

The Hoover administration has been marked by a very strange policy. For three years the policy of this administration has been to minimize and conceal deficits by exaggerated overestimates of returning prosperity and consequent revenue. The policy has resulted in staggering deficits, which are the most important causes of continued depression. Confronted with the most desperate crisis in our history, the administration's offerings were, first, a repetition of this hazard with the credit of the United States by putting forward new exaggerations of estimated revenue.

In another address in this Chamber I have gone into that subject in detail and have shown that every estimate made, either by former Secretary Mellon or by the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, was strangely at variance with the true receipts of the Treasury. Scarcely in a single instance have their estimates come within a hundred million dollars, in some cases the variance being $600,000,000, of the actual amount; and we recall now that during this session of the Congress, when the great task we have been cooperating with the administration to perform has been to raise revenue sufficient to meet the deficit, every time we proposed to levy a tax to raise more revenue, they came in and admitted an additional deficit, and we had to raise still more taxes. So that at the end it was said by Secretary Mills that this year's deficit would be something like $2,900,000,000, almost three-fourths as much as the Civil War cost the Government of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will also recall that Mr. Hyde and Mr. Mills and Mr. Hurley appeared in person or by letter before the Committee on Appropriations and fought vigorously every attempt to reduce expenditures in their respective departments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is anticipating my remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

ERRONEOUS ESTIMATES IN BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am stating now the characteristic policies and measures of the Hoover administration.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is an important body. Its success was predicated from the beginning on a balanced Budget. Its failure was inevitable unless the Budget were balanced.

Another feature of the fiscal policy of this administration was that it sought to balance the Budget by improbable anticipations of returning prosperity. Every estimate sent to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate as to the amount of revenue necessary to balance the Budget was based on an assumption that there would be a 20 per cent or more return in prosperity within a short period. Since prosperity did not return, and business in consequence failed to revive, the deficit was still further increased.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to point out, in line with what the Senator is saying, that one afternoon while the tax bill was before us for consideration the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration spokesman in the Senate said that the Budget was balanced. The very next morning at 11 o'clock the same people, the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration spokesman here, admitted it was $275,000,000 short.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and we, like faithful officers, raised our sights and took another shot at American business and industry, found new sources of taxation, and used them without remorse.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to the deficit, it is estimated now that the deficit is about $3,000,000,000, the largest deficit ever incurred by a government of this or any other country except during war. I call attention to the fact that in the previous fiscal year, ended June 30, 1931, there was a deficit of approximately $903,000,000, while in each of the preceding years back to 1920 there was a surplus. Now the deficit is nearly $3,000,000,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would like to suggest, while Senators are making much ado about the deficit, that it is only $8,000,000 a day, after all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has a very happy way of throwing humor into a tragic situation. I envy him the power of thought and of expression that enables him to enliven our proceedings in that manner. But, after all, Mr. President, the point I am trying to make clear is that the administration has not dealt frankly with the American people in the matter of deficits. For three years it has been covering up deficits, in the hope, no doubt, that business would be quickened and revived, and that revenues would be increased, and that their mistakes would be completely covered.

Another feature of this mistaken policy was the taxing of the point of least resistance instead of taxing that which is actually essential for economic welfare, with a resulting tax bill which was so unequal and abortive as of itself to constitute a barrier to returning business.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

A great deal has been said about the subject of economy. The Secretary of War last night declared that the provision in the Democratic platform urging reduction in Federal expenditures by 25 per cent was rank hypocrisy. The Secretary ought not to use language of that character, in view of some facts which I am going to point out in connection with previous campaigns. The simple truth is that the Government of the United States has grown too big and costs too much, and ought to be reduced in size and expense, and that thought is close to the hearts of the American people. That it is a difficult problem, those of us who have been studying it during recent months can not deny. But it is possible and the task ought to be undertaken and carried out.

The Secretary said that Congress has been very unwise and unjust in denying the President the power to make economies and to put them into effect, the implication being that the President ought to be given the authority to make any changes in the Government that appeal to him as necessary, advisable, or economical. The President, under authority enacted by Congress, now has the power to consolidate and abolish bureaus, and he has done little or nothing under the power that he now has. When the Senate of the United States unanimously passed a resolution a few weeks ago calling upon the President to consult with his Cabinet and recommend to the Congress specific means and measures for the reduction of Government expenses, he declined to make reply.

REDUCTIONS IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES THWARTED

The President commended his Cabinet officers in public statements and messages for their efforts to procure economy when every Senator who hears me knows that when an effort was being made to reduce the cost of Government it was the President's Cabinet officers who came down here and used all the influence they possess to thwart the efforts of Congress. They sent out into the country and appealed to citizens to send to Washington threats and appeals to Members of Congress to keep them from doing that which Secretary Hurley said the President was so anxious to do, and which the President's Cabinet was so anxious to do, but for the indifference or negligence of Congress.

The "three musketeers" were the greatest offenders. They did not want any reductions made in the expenditures of the departments of which they are the heads. They advocated reductions in the abstract, but opposed them in the concrete. The President had ample power to make specific recommendations. What he desired and what they wanted was that the President be given a free and unrestrained hand to do anything he pleased or wished. Congress did not grant that. It performed its duty to a degree and retained a measure of supervision over reductions or changes that were to be made.

It flashes into my mind now that Secretary Mills denounced the Congress in his speech for seeking to take back to itself the power to fix tariff rates.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Before the Senator leaves the matter I wish he would advert to the furlough situation. I was informed by a gentleman in one of the departments the other day that it would cost more just to administer the furlough plan than the Government would save by the 8.3 per cent reduction in salaries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes; I think the furlough system is a failure so far as it may be regarded as a measure of economy. Senators will remember that when the Economy Committee had reported and recommended a straight cut in salaries, the President came down and from the Vice President's desk commended the committee and appealed to Senators to stand by the committee, and the very next day his Secretary, Mr. Newton, was here attempting to influence Senators to repudiate the action of the Economy Committee and to sustain the President's pet program of furloughs. After it was sustained it became apparent that very little economy would result from it, but that incalculable inconvenience and displacement and disorganization were certain.

THE TARIFF

Mr. President, I was referring to the criticism of Congress by Secretary Mills in connection with the flexible provision of the tariff law. He was outraged. His sense of justice and good government was greatly shocked and he was rendered anxious because the Democrats had sought to take back to the Congress the power which the Constitution imposes upon it to levy duties, imposts, and excises. In the very next paragraph of his speech he denounced in unmeasured terms the proposal of the Democratic Party for international conferences respecting reciprocal tariff duties and declared that under the Constitution Congress is the sole power that can deal with subjects pertaining to the tariff, and that the Congress ought not to divest itself of the authority which the Constitution reposes in it. Reconcile those two declarations, Mr. President, and you will have performed a very difficult, indeed an impossible, task.

PROGRAM OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Something has been said from time to time during the course of my remarks about the Democratic program. Secretary Hurley was greatly disturbed because he said the Democrats could not do anything but wait until the Republicans adopted their platform in order to see what the Republicans were going to do. He repeated the assertion that the Democrats had no program.

In addition to that relating to the cancellation of debts, the regulation of public utilities, the supervision of banks, the supervision of the stock market, the refinancing of agricultural mortgages, the establishment of State systems of old-age unemployment pensions, the reduction of hours of labor, the maintenance of the national credit by an honest annual balancing of the Budget, there remain other important features of the Democratic program including a declaration in favor of eliminating corrupt practices in elections by continuous publicity of political contributions and expenditures. It is of vital importance that the integrity of elections be maintained. Experience has shown how often corrupt agencies have thwarted the will of the people by the use of excessive funds in elections. The Democratic party commits itself to limiting those expenditures and to the protection of the public against the evils of corrupt practices in elections.

Mr. President, I have said that the Harding administration may properly be characterized as an era of graft and corruption, that the Coolidge administration was distinguished or marked by mergers, consolidations, overcapitalization, and similar processes culminating in an orgy of speculation that well-nigh wrecked the fortunes of the people of the Republic. Let me point out that there are three outstanding measures of the Hoover administration, the administration which Secretary Hurley lauds with such emphasis and pride. What are those three outstanding measures?

THE SMOOT-HAWLEY TARIFF ACT

The Smoot-Hawley tariff act of 1930 is one. At a time when every consideration of the public interest and every thought of the promotion of private business and the collection of foreign debts due the United States Government should have prompted a fair revision of the tariff downward, the Republican Congress, after having been called to Washington by the President to revise the agricultural tariff rates, entered upon a general revision and raised the tariff barriers higher and higher until in many instances they absolutely shut out all imports. Many prohibitive duties were imposed. Under that policy the Republican administration diminished exports, made more difficult the collection of foreign debts, and impaired the success of domestic industries and commerce.

Out in the great stretches of our country are thousands of men and women who lift their faces to heaven in prayer for relief from conditions which no act of theirs has brought about. All throughout this Republic there is a demand for revision of the tariff laws in the United States so as to permit fairer and fuller intercourse, so as to preserve and rebuild our foreign trade which has well-nigh been destroyed by an inexcusable policy of exclusiveness and isolation. One country after another, following the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, enacted retaliatory tariff measures. The United States found her domestic commerce shrinking, her foreign commerce almost wholly destroyed. One feature of the Democratic program is to right and correct that condition.

Ah, but Secretary Hurley says the Democrats can not do anything on the subject of the tariff because they voted for tariffs themselves. In many instances Democrats did vote for tariffs on commodities grown or produced within their States, no doubt on the theory that it is unjust, unfair, and oppressive to permit whatever special privileges grow out of a protective tariff to be conferred on a few industries in which their people are not concerned. But underneath it all is the sound proposal of the Democratic Party to enact a competitive tariff for revenue. No; it will not enable the maker of trust-controlled goods in the United States, like the Aluminum Co. of America, to fix whatever price that maker wills, and then, shielded by a tariff law, raise again and again the price of his products still higher. But it will give the quick-minded, brave-hearted American citizen an equal chance in the struggle of life with any other people and with all competitors. That is what he is entitled to and that is all he is entitled to. He will take his chance on that and he will win.

THE FARM BOARD

The second notable act of the Hoover administration is the farm marketing act.

Senators have heard of that before, have they not? Secretary Hurley said last night, attributing everything good that has come during recent years to the wisdom and efforts of President Hoover:

He directed the Farm Board to take and hold the surplus until better markets could be obtained.

Yes; we appropriated $500,000,000 of public money to be used by the Farm Board for that purpose. They have lost in their ventures $250,000,000; the remainder is invested in surplus products; and the prices of the products dealt in have gone lower and lower, until now, with two exceptions, they are lower than they ever were before in the history of American agriculture. And that is a subject of boast by the Secretary of War, who is so blinded and infatuated by his impressions of the glory and dignity and power of the head of the administration that he can see a gigantic accomplishment on the part of the Farm Board in behalf of American agriculture; and yet, out in the homes on the hills of our country, and in the homes that nestle in the valleys, there are millions of American farmers who are having their homes sold under the hammer of the auctioneer solely because the prices of their commodities are so low that they are unable to realize the cost of production much less to put apart a portion of the proceeds for payment on the mortgages which cover their homes. Ah, I am glad to meet the challenge of the Secretary of War for a comparison of programs, for a consideration of the record of the administration.

THE MORATORIUM

Another notable act of the Hoover administration, according to the Secretary of War, is the moratorium. We all remember that when the time was coming on last summer for the payment of the installments due us from foreign debtors the President summoned to Washington or called by telephone many of the Members of this body and committed some of them to his proposal to suggest a moratorium to Germany and to the Allies who are our debtors. Mr. President, it was quite a different thing from granting a moratorium when the necessity for it was present and from suggesting it as a part of an international policy by the President of the United States. Some of those debtors were far more able to pay their obligations to the United States than the United States was to have the obligations postponed. Already there was an astounding deficit in the Treasury of the United States. The people of those countries were far more able to pay the taxes necessary to raise the installments due on the debts than were the people of this country, stricken as they were by drought, by famine, by the destruction of foreign and domestic markets, and the consequent decline in commodity prices.

The result of the moratorium, the Secretary declared last night, had no relation to the cancellation of the foreign debts; and yet I think that it did have relation to that subject; true, not direct relation but indirect relation; for, as a natural consequence, we are now confronted with a request for a cancellation or reduction of those obligations.

CANCELLATION OF FOREIGN DEBTS

I am not going to review, because it has been recently fully discussed, the question whether representatives of the United States, acting officially or unofficially, committed themselves or sought to commit their Government to a proposal to reduce or cancel those debts. I do know that foreign debtors have combined in an agreement that they will forgive the obligations of Germany due them on condition that the United States cancels the debts which the foreign debtor nations owe this Government; and I know that the President states in his letter to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], a letter of this date, that he was not a party to that arrangement; that he knew nothing about it; that he does not consent to it and and will never consent to pressure being put on the American people by a combination of foreign debtors; and yet I know that in the future we will be asked to say whether we will transfer the remainder of this load of debt to the backs of our already overburdened people or leave it where it belongs—on the governments and peoples who contracted it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, at this juncture in the Senator's very able and interesting and timely speech I wish to call attention to the statement issued at the time when the Premier of France, M. Laval, was here, the statement having been authorized by the President and the Premier.

In so far as intergovernmental obligations are concerned—

Clearly referring to reparations and debts—

"In so far as intergovernmental obligations are concerned," say Mr. Hoover and M. Laval, "we recognize that, prior to the expiration of the Hoover year of postponement, some agreement regarding them may be necessary covering the period of business depression, as to which the two governments make all reservations. The initiative in this matter should be taken at an early date by the European powers principally concerned within the framework of the agreements existing prior to July 1, 1931."

So, if recently European powers have united in a concord with a view to the attitude of the United States, it is perfectly plain that it was at the suggestion of the President of of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the Senator may have the information or not, but, if he has, will he tell the Senate, if the President is now so strongly against the cancellation of the foreign debt or any part of it, first, why the Republican Convention did not have the courage to put such a declaration in their platform instead of keeping quiet about it, and, second, why it was that at the beginning of the present session of Congress the President of the United States came here and asked for the recreation of the War Debt Funding Commission?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, frankly, it seems to me the policy of the administration has meant a revision of the foreign debts. I do not wish to put myself in the attitude of questioning the veracity of anyone, but I think the only meaning that the suggestion for the revival of the debt-funding commission could have would be a reduction or revision in some way of the debts. I do not know what else it may have meant. I do not understand what would be the advantage of reviving the commission unless something of that nature were in contemplation.

But, Mr. President, I am marking out now clearly that there is nothing in the record of the administration, either in its fiscal policies, its domestic measures, or its foreign policies that justifies the arrogance displayed by the "Three Musketeers" in their public addresses. It does not lie with them to denounce the Democrats as hypocrites or as lacking in patriotism.

REPUBLICAN EXPERIENCE IN GOVERNMENT

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his Boston speech, concluded, I believe, by saying that the Republican Party had had a long experience in control of the Government, and he did not believe the people would require the "veterans" to retire.

Mr. President, neither in President Harding's administration, nor in that of President Coolidge, nor in that of Mr. Hoover is there anything of which to boast.

CAPITALIZATION OF DISCONTENT

The Secretary of War last evening complained bitterly that the Democrats had capitalized discontent and had laid the blame on the present administration, in part, at least, for the difficulties under which our people struggle. I wonder if anybody, I wonder if you gentlemen in the press gallery, have forgotten what happened in the campaign of 1928. I wonder if you remember the propaganda that the Republican Party carried on in order to win that election? Surely, in view of the great indignation of the Secretary of War about what he calls unfair and prejudicial political methods, I am justified in recurring to that. The President said, "We have abolished poverty." In the Washington Herald of October, 1928, there was published a political advertisement a copy of which I hold in my hand. The headline is "A Chicken for Every Pot." [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. And we have not even got the pot. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We have got the pot, yes; but in the pot is crow instead of chicken. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. Well, the housewife has been compelled to pawn the pot for a dust of meal. [Laughter.]

PROSPERITY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In every national campaign since I was a boy—and I have been making assaults with intent to make political speeches ever since I was 19 years old, and sometimes I think the older I get the poorer and more ineffective become my efforts—the principal claim that the Democrats had to contest in order even to have a chance for victory was "prosperity." Have you forgotten that? "Oh, do not stop the wheels from turning! Do not strike a blow at industry! Let the smoke ascend from the factory chimneys. Hear the voice of prosperity in the whir of machinery. See it as it gleams and glistens in the glossy fabric of the loom. Behold the full dinner pail and a chicken in every pot!" Democrats responsible for all the ills that come, whether consisting of storm, flood, earthquake, or accident; Republicans to be credited for the sun that shines, for the rains that fructify the soils, for all the blessings and benefits conferred by an all-wise Providence on a deserving people!

"Prosperity! Yes," they declared; "if you elect a Democrat President of the United States business will at once begin to decline. Unhappiness will succeed cheer and promise. Despair will sink into the human heart, where now abideth hope."

And on that false issue—an issue which every honest person in the Republican Party now must admit to be false—they won election after election. Bankers, merchants, railroad magnates, other captains of industry were made afraid to put the Democratic Party in power because they feared unwise and oppressive legislation! They could trust the Republican Party, they said. They were induced to believe in the theory that so long as a Republican was retained in the White House business would be prosperous and human effort would succeed.

Look at the extent to which they carried it in 1928 in the advertisement to which I have already referred! They paid for this. They may have put it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and sent it out at Government expense; I suspect they did; but certainly they paid for this as an advertisement in the Washington Herald on the 20th of October, 1928. I shall not take the time to read it all. Listen:

The Republican Party is not a "poor man's party."

If there is anybody in this country who doubts that is true, he will realize that it is untrue only because under a Republican administration and Republican policies and measures everybody has become poor. No; the Republican Party is not a poor man's party!

Republican prosperity has erased that degrading phrase from our political vocabulary.

No such word in the vocabulary as "poverty" or "poor man"; everybody rich, poverty abolished.

Republican efficiency has filled the workingman's dinner pail, and his gasoline tank besides—

Get that, oh, my fellow countrymen! Not only a full dinner pail, but a full gasoline tank!

made telephone, radio, and sanitary plumbing standard household equipment; and placed the whole Nation in the silk-stocking class.

Oh, yes! When you see 25,000 men walking with measured tread through this city, and in every great city of the country thousands and in some cases hundreds of thousands suffering because they can not get work, and then read that statement, it is almost enough to cause you to take an axe and a torch and go out and destroy the temple of Republicanism.

Placed the whole Nation in the silk-stocking class——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I should like to have a comment from the Senator from Oklahoma on that foolish statement.

Mr. GORE. The Senator says that 25,000 men in this city, and like numbers in other cities, are walking the streets in search of an opportunity to earn their daily bread by their daily toil. I remind the Senator that four years ago Mr. Hoover said that he intended to put the American people on their feet, and he has many a one afoot to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is one feature of the Republican program that has been carried out. [Laughter.]

Let me resume reading. Listen: Not only is the Republican Party responsible for the plumbing in the homes of the people, and for the gasoline in the tanks of the citizens' automobiles, but the Hoover campaign committee actually made the following contention:

During eight years of Republican management, we have built more and better homes, erected more skyscrapers, passed more benefactory laws, and more laws to regulate and purify immigration, inaugurated more conservation measures, more measures to standardize and increase production, expand export markets, and reduce industrial and human junk piles, than in any previous quarter century.

Take that boast and view it in the light of this day, and I wonder what will be the reaction of the citizens of this country when the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Agriculture—any one of the "three musketeers"—goes out to claim that the Democrats are capitalizing discontent when their candidate speaks of "the forgotten man."

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. I think it might be appropriate at this point to inform the Senator that according to the latest official reports, in 124 cities in the United States 1,500,000 families are being fed from charity funds.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. An appalling statement! How strange it seems in view of this political advertisement by which President Hoover, and his crowd over there across the aisle, won the election over two honest and deserving Democratic candidates in 1928. [Laughter.]

Yes; they not only put in the plumbing, supplied the gasoline for automobiles, erected skyscrapers, and regulated exports—what have they done to exports? They have destroyed the export trade of the United States; and it is not due in large part, and certainly not in whole, to any depression. It is due to political policies carried out under laws enacted during either the Harding, the Coolidge, or the Hoover administrations.

Let me read some more from this sublime example of Republican fairness in carrying on an election:

Republican prosperity is written on fuller wage envelopes, written in factory chimney smoke—

I knew that "smoke" would have to come—written on the walls of new construction, written in savings-bank books—

Listen to that!

Written in mercantile balances, and written in the peak value of stocks and bonds.

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, the only true declaration in that statement is the last—"written in the peak value of stocks and bonds." I have already shown and emphasized what that means—dishonest values; values inflated by the exercise of political influence; values encouraged, if not invited, without regard to any relationship to earning power.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. As to savings banks, we had more bank failures in Washington yesterday than we had under the last year of the Wilson administration; and we had more bank failures in the one city of Chicago in the last three weeks than we had in the eight years of the Wilson administration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has anticipated what I was intending to say, and he has said it better than I could state it.

Mr. President, imagine boasting about banks as reflecting the results of Republican measures and policies! If they could claim credit for the things of which they boast, shall they escape liability for the things of which they must feel ashamed?

Republican prosperity has reduced hours and increased earning capacity, silenced discontent—put the proverbial "chicken in every pot." And a car in every backyard, to boot.

Listen:

Oh, yes. Chicken has been succeeded by crow. [Laughter.] The American people are eating crow for voting the Republican ticket in 1928, for accepting such declarations as that to which I am referring.

It has restored financial confidence and enthusiasm, changed credit from a rich man's privilege to a common utility, generalized the use of time-saving devices and released women from the thrall of domestic drudgery.

Mr. President, I am surprised that your party did not claim in 1928 to have relieved motherhood of the pains incident to childbirth. [Laughter.]

It has provided every county in the country with its concrete road and knitted the highways of the Nation into a unified traffic system.

Listen:

Republican administration has restored to the railroads solvency, efficiency, and par securities.

Never in my lifetime have railroad securities fallen so low as at this hour. Never in my lifetime have railroads been confronted with more difficult financial problems than at the present time. Never before in my lifetime, save possibly immediately following the war period, when the railroads were being returned to their owners by the Government, have the railroad systems of this country been compelled to go to the Government to secure credit and loans in order to avoid receiverships. Yet the Republican Party in 1928, as a false and fraudulent process for getting votes, claimed that they had restored the solvency of railroads, placed them on an independent financial basis, and claimed they had given a great many benefits to the people of the Nation with which the Republican Party had nothing whatever to do. They knew it was false when they made the representation. They knew they had nothing to do with putting plumbing in the homes of the people. They knew they had nothing to do with relieving American women from drudgery. They knew that their policies had nothing to do with bringing about the period of apparent prosperity which was so quickly and amazingly superseded by decline and depression in 1929 during a Republican administration.

"HOOVER LUCKY POCKET PIECE"

Mr. President, some good friend in the gallery reminds me of another form of political fraud that ought to make Pat Hurley blush! I doubt if anything could make him blush, but if anything in this world could accomplish that result, this ought to do it. I hold in my hand, sent me from the gallery, an effective and unusual form of political advertising used in 1928. Listen to what appears on this "lucky pocket piece":

Good for four years of prosperity.

This is a brass coin, colored to represent gold, and it is a fitting emblem of the political unfairness that prompted its creation. It was used by the Republican campaign committee. On the other side is a picture of that now emaciated animal, the elephant, so thin and feeble now that he staggers when he tries to lift his trunk.

Hoover lucky pocket piece.

Oh, my! That would bring the voters to the polls. That would make them look with scorn on Al Smith and his associate on the Democratic ticket. That would make them lift their eyes in grateful acknowledgment for the opportunity to vote for "The Miracle Man."

THE MIRACLE MAN

Perhaps it would prolong these remarks unduly to enter into a discussion of that phase of campaign propaganda resorted to in 1928. May I just speak for a moment on "The Miracle Man."

The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who was the chief proponent of the President during the campaign of 1928 and probably made him more votes than any other campaign orator, said that Mr. Hoover was no ordinary person, that he was a most remarkable man; and immediately they began circulating propaganda to elect the extraordinary personality, the statesman of broad experience, of infinite business knowledge, "The Miracle Man."

The Senator from Idaho was not like a candidate down in the good old State of Arkansas in my boyhood days, who ran for district attorney. He was the best man on the ticket, but did not get very many votes and was defeated. So he said after the election, "I am through with politics. I never expect to run for office again as long as I live. Everyone who comes into my office and asks me a question must retain me. I don't work for nothing any more. My knowledge and experience ought to be paid for." The next day two well-known local politicans, father and son, came into the office and asked him a question. The lawyer said, "Before I answer that question, you had better retain me." They looked at each other and said, "What does he mean?" He replied, "I simply mean pay me a fee." They declared, "Why, you would not charge us for just answering a question, would you?" He answered, "Yes. I have made up my mind that everybody who profits by my knowledge and experience must pay me for it. That is my business." One of them said, "You ought not to do that. We did all we could for you in the election." He said, "Yes, you did. You did me all the harm you could. You talked for me and voted against me." [Laughter.]

The Senator from Idaho was not that way. He made a bold champion of the President, on the theory that the latter was a most extraordinary man, that his economic policies would benefit the people of the Nation, that his strong hand would guide the ship of state through every turbulent sea. But now we have the spectacle of all of the policies having broken down. We have Democrats in Congress assisting the President to pass his relief measures, and members of the President's Cabinet, the "three musketeers," going out to the country and denouncing Democrats, declaring that they have no policies of their own, that they merely support Republican policies. That is unfair, as I have shown from the declarations contained in the official program of the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, the simple truth is that any political party which claims to have within its power the control of the prosperity of the people, any political party that claims that it can dispel night and bring the dawn, any political party that boasts that disaster can not occur while it is in power, is deceiving the American people. It is entirely true that measures and policies, both National and State, have some direct relationship to the happiness, to the liberties, and to the prosperity of the people; but it is also true that to the industry, the courage, the thrift, the enterprise, the indomitable resolution of the citizenship of this Nation may fairly be attributed all the glories that have come to our people and all the victories that have come to our flag. In these troublesome times, when dangers not heretofore known reveal themselves, it is the part of patriotism and statesmanship to look bravely into public questions, to make and practice no deception concerning the relationship of politics to business.

A NEW DEAL WILL BRING IMPROVEMENT

I do believe that with a new deal, with a change of administration, with the application of the principles in the Democratic program which I have described, better times will come, equality of opportunity will be enjoyed, unemployment will be diminished; but I would not for my life claim that a change in laws can quickly overcome the results of mistaken policies and of erroneous conceptions of government.

We see now everyone looking to Washington, everyone expecting Washington to supply his daily needs, to procure employment for him, to make his business prosperous, to lend him the money necessary to carry on his trade. All that is the result of the sin and crime of the Republican Party in its campaigns heretofore, teaching the people to believe that prosperity was made by Republican administrations.

Mr. President, for the attention that the Senate has given to my remarks I desire to express my thanks. The Secretary of War, concluding his address last night, stirred his audience to a measure of enthusiasm when he said that he believed the verdict in November would be in favor of President Hoover and his policies. My reply to that declaration is that it profits little for the Secretary or myself to enter the realm of prophecy, but if it be true that the people give a verdict supporting the President and his policies in the election in November, then may God have mercy on the people and the Government we all love!

OFFER FOR PRINTING IN THE RECORD

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD an address by Mrs. Jesse W. Nicholson, president of the National Woman's Democratic Law Enforcement League and the editor of the Woman Voter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection, of course; but the Senator who objected this morning, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], is absent, and I suggest that the matter be postponed until he returns to the Senate floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL BANKING ACT TO THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4574) to extend the provisions of the national bank act to the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes, which was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "States," to strike out the remainder of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMENTS ON PRESIDENT HOOVER'S LETTER TO SENATOR BORAH

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday President Hoover addressed a letter to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which letter read as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your inquiry this morning, through Secretary Stimson, as to the effect on the United States of recent agreements in Europe.

Our people are, of course, gratified at the settlement of the strictly European problem of reparations or any of the other political or economic questions that have impeded European recovery. Such action, together with the real progress in disarmament, will contribute greatly to world stability.

I wish to make it absolutely clear, however, that the United States has not been consulted regarding any of the agreements reported by the press to have been concluded recently at Lausanne, and that of course it is not a party to, nor in any way committed to any such agreements.

While I do not assume it to be the purpose of any of these agreements to effect combined action of our debtors, if it shall be so interpreted then I do not propose that the American people shall be pressed into any line of action or that our policies shall be in any way influenced by such a combination either open or implied

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. President, I am very happy that the President, after some weeks of delay and after a veritable storm of opposition against his secrecy in the matter, at last has concluded to take the American people into his confidence about these European agreements.

I am glad to know "that the United States has not been consulted regarding any of the agreements reported by the press to have been concluded recently at Lausanne."

I am glad to know that the United States is not "in any way committed to any such agreement."

I am glad to know that the President does "not propose that the American people shall be pressed into any line of action or that our policy shall be in any way influenced by such a combination open or implied."

Mr. President, I commend President Hoover for these statements as far as they go, but I wish he had gone further and stated that he does not intend or expect to enter upon any kind of negotiations for the further modification or cancellation of the debts due us by European countries. In no place does he say that he does not intend to act finally in the program he has heretofore attempted to carry out, both in his public messages to the House and in his other public messages; that is to say, to bring about some degree of reduction or cancellation of debts.

I regret that he does not say that he is not going to have American representatives at any conference at which the question of our foreign debts could be discussed at all. I wish he had stated that he is not going to enter upon any other negotiations for any further moratorium. But he does not say it. Why can not he say that he intends to take American ground, carry out American policies, as adopted by an American Congress, rather than merely take the position that he does?

I wish he had stated that he had accepted the last act of Congress on the subject of reduction or cancellation of debts as final and binding upon him, and that there would be no more efforts upon his part to open the debt question that Congress has already passed upon, and which he had approved with his signature. When the moratorium measure was enacted he made the direct statement that there should be no direct cancellation, and the President approved that measure by his signature. Does his approval mean nothing? I wish he had gone forward and said further that he is going to stand by his own signature and is not going to permit, so far as he can prevent it, any change in the situation as to these foreign debts.

I wish that the President had stated that the international bankers had lent their money to foreign countries and to foreign people with their eyes wide open and that he does not believe it is the duty of this country to press the collection of those private debts ahead of its duty to collect these public debts due to the American people. But he said nothing about it.

At all events, Mr. President, President Hoover has stated that neither he nor the United States had any prior knowledge of the Lausanne agreement; that there have been no commitments, express or implied, on the part of the United States to take any course of action in regard to the further reduction or cancellation of our debts, and that this Government would not be bound by any of these European agreements. Mr. President, I believe I express the almost unanimous opinion of America in saying that we are devoutly grateful to the President for these belated and difficult-to-be-obtained assurances. I sincerely hope that he will stand by these assurances. Because of these assurances I believe that the Congress can now go home with the feeling that another moratorium or other debt reductions or cancellations will not be secretly foisted upon our country while Congress is not in session.

In this connection I want to take this occasion to congratulate the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on obtaining this letter from the President. In so doing I think he has successfully invaded the proverbial Hoover sanctum of secrecy and has possibly saved great sums to the American people; that is, of course, if the President will continue his stand as set forth in his letter to the Senator from Idaho.

If European nations, either singly or together, want to repudiate their debts that is their matter; but surely we ought not to invite them to do so or agree that they may do so, or hint directly or indirectly that they may do so. I do not believe that any self-respecting nation will ever repudiate its obligations. If it does repudiate its obligations, it can bring nothing but dishonor and disrespect to itself.

Of course, it is all poppycock to talk about the remaining debts being "war debts." The war debts, with the exception of a small portion of Great Britain's debt, have all long since been cancelled by our country. Europe owes us the present debt for money loaned after the war for the purpose of reconstruction and administration of their several governments, with the small exception to which I have referred. Since the Lausanne agreement and since our President assures us that America is not privy to it expressly or impliedly, I hope we may all now agree that the heretofore expressed will of Congress shall be carried out by the President.

Mr. President, much has been said as to who is the author of the Lausanne agreement. Of course I do not know who is the author. It has never been disclosed by anybody. Premier Herriot said the agreement meant one thing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain, said it meant another thing. Prime Minister MacDonald said it meant another thing. Mr. Stimson said he did not know anything about it. I do not believe there is anyone who does know just what it means or just why it was gotten up, except that it was for one purpose. That purpose was to remove $11,000,000,000 of tax burdens from European shoulders, where they ought to be, and place them upon the already overburdened tax-laden backs of American taxpayers.

Mr. President, I have protested from the very beginning against the cancellation or the reduction of these debts. I believe that I voice the sentiment of practically every Senator and every liberty-loving American in this country when I say that we have had enough of any proposed cancellation or reduction of the debts, and that hereafter the President, whoever he may be, should give no concern and make no hint and make no suggestion and make no proposal for the further cancellation or the further reduction of these debts so honestly due to the American Government.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, and that Mr. COL-

LIER, Mr. RAINEY, Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. TREADWAY were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

REPUBLICAN POLICIES AND ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, misleading statements and charges against the administration which is directing the affairs of this Government through this critical period should not be allowed to stand unchallenged lest they befog the public mind and retard an orderly recovery from the throes of depression. A medley of conflicting charges has been lodged against the economic policy of the Republican Party. On one hand, the Republicans are accused of failing to exercise world leadership. According to one distinguished critic, they threw away "the greatest opportunity for human progress within a thousand years." America had an opportunity to lead the world into an imaginary paradise, but instead the Republican Party decided that it would be wiser for us to mind our own business and not become involved in European politics. To the minds of some Democratic spokesman, on the eve of a presidential campaign, that seems to be an abominable doctrine.

On the other hand, the United States is accused of having formulated the economic policies of the world since 1920. The Government, under Republican leadership, is denounced for failure to exercise international leadership; and, at the same time, it is censured for having led the world astray. It is difficult to understand which criticism our Democratic accusers wish to stand.

But that is a matter of no importance. What I wish to direct to the attention of the Senate is the injustice of the charges here made against the President, and the unsoundness of the one policy suggested for relieving the country of its economic distress. It is charged that the Republican administration has exercised no leadership in this emergency, and that the country has been allowed to drift toward panic. No charge that might be raised against the administration could be more out of harmony with the facts. No man who ever sat in the White House, Mr. President, has been more devoted to the public welfare than Herbert Hoover.

Nearly every practical step that has been taken to relieve our distressing economic depression on a nation-wide scale has been initiated at the White House. What more do the critics of the President ask? What more can be done to ameliorate the conditions that have been brought upon the world by unwise business and financial policies without embarking upon the quicksands of socialism?

A few weeks ago the Senator from Tennessee admitted that—

> The Democrats face the tremendous responsibility of offering a sound and constructive program analyzing basic causes and offering basic remedies with respect to the domestic and international conditions, to the extent that the latter affect us.

What has the party done to carry forward that responsibility, except to fall in line with the constructive program inaugurated by the President? I wish to say, Mr. President, that the cooperation which has been forthcoming from the Democratic leaders in this respect is highly commendable. But there is no excuse for any Democrat to denounce the President of the United States for lack of leadership when the critic himself has no contribution to make to the country's economic welfare.

In the midst of adversity, President Hoover has never once been stampeded into rash action that might weaken the fundamental structure of American industry and finance. He is criticized because the relief measures he has proposed are designed to set the wheels of industry and commerce into motion once more, and not to upset the basic structure of our economic system. The President is denounced because he refused to turn a deep-seated evolution of economic forces into a revolution. If the American people will study well the accusations that are made against their leader in the White House, they will soon recognize that the captious charges that are made against him are, in reality, praises for his sagacity and far-sighted policy.

Temporary recovery from the depression through the adoption of uneconomic practices would be a curse upon future generations of American citizens. This is a great day for those who lean toward a dole for the unemployed and toward bureaucratic control over industry and commerce. They revel in taunting Government officials because prosperity is in temporary suspension. But every sober student of history knows what would happen if Congress should yield to their demands. The Republican Party must stand firmly against disintegrating forces. The restoration of prosperity at the cost of economic freedom, or with the loss of the traditional responsibility and independence that each individual in America feels, would be a lasting blight upon the Nation.

Socialistic and bureaucratic measures are the only alternative to the patient policy of the Republican administration. President Hoover is working almost night and day to strengthen the weak spots in the American economic system. It is easy for critics to point out the factors which entered into this world-wide depression and to manifest their superior judgment upon events that have passed into history. But when it comes to pointing the way out of our present dilemma they speak with less precision and for the most part keep their discussions high in the realm of fantastic theory, where they may evade any contact with unyielding facts and conditions. While the President continues to wrestle with forces that are beyond their knowledge—forces that are kept from public attention for obvious psychological reasons—his critics merely stand on the side lines and pretend to hold within their bosoms the secret of economic restoration.

Foremost among the theoretical panaceas that are designed to cure this world-wide depression is reduction of the American tariff. At its national convention in Chicago the Democratic Party denounced the existing tariff law and demanded "a competitive tariff for revenue." Of course, Democratic Senators would not stoop to vote for protective tariffs. Nevertheless, I think that the Senate might find some interest in the records of Senators who have denounced the Smoot-Hawley Act at Chicago or on the floor of the Senate. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] waxed eloquent over the alleged "iniquities" of the Republican tariff at Chicago. But he did not tell the convention what line of reasoning led him to perceive that the duties on coal and oil, for which he recently cast his vote, were vicious protective tariffs. Does the Senator pretend it is only a happy accident that his home State is interested in the coal and petroleum industries and an unhappy accident that neither of those duties is calculated to produce enough revenue to be worthy of consideration? I know from his address that the Senator objects "to the use of the power of taxation by small groups to stimulate their particular interests with an artificial invigoration at the expense and to the damage of the whole people." But I do not know how the Senator reconciles his votes with that pretty theory.

The Senator from Kentucky did not tell the Democratic convention that he helped to write the Smoot-Hawley Act with his votes in favor of increased duties on casein, gypsum, cattle, and silver ores. At that time the Senator had an opportunity to vote for the lower duties which he now demands. Yet he recorded votes against lowering the rates on olive oil, against lower rates for china clay, mustard seed, sole leather, and hides. It is very apparent that the Senator believes in tariff reduction for everyone except the industries of his home State.

Let us turn to the record of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who added his voice to the antiprotection chorus at Chicago. The Senator voted for increased duties on casein, thread, wool rags, crude gypsum, cattle, and mustard seed. He voted in favor of maintaining high duties on card or burr waste, wool rags, coarse wool, mustard seed, and hides.

Both of the distinguished Senators from Montana, who subscribe to the theory of "competitive tariffs for revenue," favored the copper tariff in the recent tax bill. The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] voted for it and announced that the senior Senator would have voted favorably had he been present. The pious pretense of the Democratic platform does not prevent any Democrat from advocating special benefits for his home State.

Not even my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the ranking Democratic member of the Finance Committee, whom I hold in the highest regard as well as in genuine effection, can resist the alluring benefits of protection when the interests of Mississippi are involved. Twice he voted in favor of increasing the duty on long-staple cotton. Higher rates on synthetic camphor, cattle, and silver ores also drew his support. Amendments were offered to reduce the duties on olive oil, filaments and yarns of rayon, and mustard seed, but the Senator from Mississippi voted against them.

When it is a question of protecting the cotton, tobacco, cattle, and silica industries the senior Senator from Georgia is as stern a protectionist as anyone on this side of the aisle. When the Smoot-Hawley Act was under consideration he voted in favor of nine increases and against six decreases. His high-tariff votes were limited only by the extent of Georgia's economic interests.

The Senator from Texas, who is also a member of the Finance Committee, recently led the fight for an embargo on petroleum; but that only confirms his previous record. He voted for 21 duty increases in the last tariff act and against 12 proposed decreases. His colleague from Texas voted in favor of 32 increases and against 12 decreases. These are by no means conspicuous examples. The senior Senator from Wyoming voted for 30 specific increases and against many more decreases. I have the list in my desk, and they are all on it. Both the Senators from New York proved themselves to be confirmed protectionists, so far as the industries of their home State are concerned.

I have no fault to find with Democrats who vote to protect the industries and the workingmen of their home States. It is their duty to promote the welfare of their States and the Nation. But I do emphatically condemn the hypocrisy of a party which forces its Representatives in Congress to denounce legislation which they have helped to enact for the benefit of their localities. I doubt if there is a Democrat in this body who would not fight to retain the benefits he secured for his locality under the tariff act of 1930. Yet every one of them is bound to support a fatuous platform which pretends that only Republicans are interested in tariff protection.

A widespread effort is being made to convince the American people that the Republican Party believes in special tariff privileges. That charge rebounds upon our Democratic critics like a vengeful boomerang. The Republican Party believes in tariff protection for all legitimate industries, labor, and agriculture. We do not skulk about the Capitol seeking special benefits for one locality while denying them to another. We candidly and emphatically prefer to give jobs to our own workingmen before considering the welfare of foreign labor. It is the Democratic Members of this body who seek special tariff privileges for their own States, and then sanctimoniously repudiate their work under the false pretense that tariff making is a vicious Republican game. It is time that the American people were fully informed of this political trickery. It is a blot which the Democratic Party can not efface until it learns the meaning of common honesty in political matters.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator believes that we ought to use domestic articles amongst our own people whenever it is possible, does he not?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe it with all my heart.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator approve the action of the Post Office Department the other day in going, in the face of the statute which we passed, and buying its supplies of twine from the Ludlow Co. of Boston—jute—instead of buying cotton produced and manufactured by our own people?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not gone into the matter. I never heard of it until the last few words that were spoken here yesterday, I think; but I want to say that if that be the case as the Senator states it now, I am opposed to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that is the Senator's attitude—and I do not challenge it, and I thank him—I am just wondering why it is that the responsible Cabinet chiefs of the administration pursue that sort of a policy toward our own people, and yet the administration protests here on the floor, through the Senator and others, that it is for American goods and American industries, while it belies its own professions by that sort of thing.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator knew my record—and more than likely he has heard about it—on this question of substituting jute for cotton, I want to say to the Senator that that question has been before the Finance Committee beginning in 1909 that I know of; and I have always stood up for American cotton, and I shall always do it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. The only other request I have to make of him is that I hope he will use his powerful influence on some of the Cabinet and responsible men in the administration to adopt the Senator's views and give us justice.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what happened when Congress attempted once before to cure a depression by revision of customs duties downward. It will be remembered that William McKinley was elected President in 1896 on a platform that demanded protection for American industries. No one will deny that McKinley believed in international trade. He took essentially the same attitude toward foreign trade that the Republican Party takes to-day. His motto was to protect American industries against unfair foreign competition so that the United States would be in a position to expand its foreign trade.

The soundness of that theory was demonstrated by its application to conditions that were very similar to those we are experiencing to-day. Clouds of depression spread over the country in 1893. A Democratic Congress was elected, in the hope that its economic policies might turn the tide of events toward prosperity. The Democrats demanded that international trade be unfettered; and since they had control of the Government, they proceeded to emasculate the American protective policy. Tariff rates were cut down lower than they had been for years, with what result? Instead of stimulating international commerce and lifting the country out of its slough of despond, this act merely left the Government with a huge deficit and the people with more acute economic distress. Even imports declined sharply, in spite of the lower rates of duty. Remember that, Senators. All you have to do is to look at the records.

In the last year under the Wilson low tariff, exports slumped to $1,050,000,000, as compared with $1,730,000,000 for the year prior to its enactment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. What did the Senator say our exports were during the last year of the Wilson tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. One billion and fifty million dollars.

Mr. CONNALLY. How do they compare with the exports last year under President Hoover's administration?

Mr. SMOOT. They were about one-third, I think.

Mr. CONNALLY. About one-third?

Mr. SMOOT. Just about. Our exports have steadily increased.

Mr. CONNALLY. Were they greater in 1931 than they were in 1930? Would the Senator mind telling us how much exports fell off in 1930 from 1929 and in 1931 from 1930?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not those figures here, but I can say this to the Senator——

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me they are quite pertinent. The Senator is talking about the present administration and he ought to quote figures dealing with the present administration.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought there was not a soul in the United States but that knew approximately what they were.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator has not the figures, I will tell him that the exports in 1930 fell off $1,000,000,000 from those of 1929.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; from the exports of 1929, the peak year. The present tariff act was not passed until late in 1930, so it did not have any effect upon the importations of 1930; but the Senator may try to compare our importations now with what they were in 1929. Why, if all the foreign trade outside of the countries themselves were added together, the whole thing would not amount to the trade of the people of the United States during that year.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. LONG. I assume that the Senator takes the view that there should be a tariff equal to the difference between the cost of producing in this country and the cost of producing abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly do.

Mr. LONG. I wonder why it is that we never have been able to get more than about one-fifth that difference in the case of oil? We got only 21 cents tariff on oil. Why is it that we can not get the Republican Party to stand with us to put oil up as high as the difference in the cost of production?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there has never been, so far as I recall, until this last year, a question of a duty upon oil. Not a soul from the South or from the West or anywhere else even suggested a duty upon oil until conditions here—world conditions, I might add—made it necessary to do it; and I want to say to the Senator that I was very glad indeed to vote for a duty upon oil.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has just said he was very glad to vote for a duty on oil.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator inform us whether or not the price of oil went up after the duty was voted?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not the quotations here, but I do know this: It will stop the importations of oil, and the American consumers will purchase American oil.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the purpose of the duty was to increase the price of oil to American producers.

Mr. SMOOT. Not altogether, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. If, as I understand, it did not have that effect, I do not see what good it did.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not understand the principle of a protective tariff.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, sir; I never have understood it, and I doubt if I ever will.

Mr. SMOOT. Another thing: The Senator does not want to understand it. But, Mr. President, this is what the oil tariff has done, at least: It has provided a market for home-produced oil; and even if the price is the same, on account of local competition, it is American oil. it is American money, and it has not been cut to pieces by foreign oil coming into this country.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. I understand from my friend from Tennessee that the price of oil actually went down with the tariff that was put on, instead of going up, as many of us contended it would do, and protect the independent industry in this country. I was further informed that the copper combination had suffered a severe blow because of the protection on copper. The point I am making is, Why was it that it took 12 years for the Republican Party to see the necessity of giving a tariff on products that would not aid monopoly?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as far as copper is concerned, the copper people themselves said that they did not care whether they had a duty upon copper or not until this very year, when we were asked to place one upon it. The Utah Copper Co., normally producing or handling sixty-odd thousand tons every day, has not a wheel moving to-day. Not only that, Mr. President, but the new discovery of copper in South Africa carries, I am told, about 12 per cent of copper, whereas the Utah copper has but 21 pounds of copper in a ton of earth.

Not until after President McKinley had been elected and called Congress into extra session in 1897 was this era of hard times brought to an end. A new protective tariff was enacted. Prosperity gradually returned, with both imports and exports growing to larger volumes than had ever been known before. Since that time the United States has never been without protection for its domestic industries. That experience earned for the Democratic Party its well-known sobriquet—" the party of hard times."

The same disastrous results probably would have followed the Democratic tariff of 1913 had not the World War swept away the competition of foreign producers for a larger share in the American market. Throughout the period of the war American producers were doubly protected in spite of Democratic policy. Competitors were so occupied with supplying the demands of their governments that they had no surplus to ship to America. Industry and agriculture in this country not only had the domestic market to supply but the war created exceptionally heavy demands for exports.

When the war was over Congress found it necessary to re-establish the protective system to save American producers from a deluge of cheap foreign commodities. Had the Democratic policy prevailed the industries that American genius, American capital and labor had developed would have been doomed. The United States would have had a chronic unemployment problem and would have fallen headlong into the present depression with no reserve strength nor capital to meet it.

Quotations from President McKinley and President Hoover as to the desirability of international trade mislead only those who are trying to substitute imports for domestic business. No doubt President Hoover would repeat to-day what he said in his Boston address—that " to insure continuous employment and maintain our wages we must find a profitable market for our surpluses." But the President did not suggest that in a vain effort to find foreign markets we jeopardize the home market we already have.

The issue here involved is not foreign trade but the protection of American enterprise. International commerce is a natural by-product of domestic trade. Throughout the annals of our country we find that foreign trade has fluctuated in close relationship to business within our borders, unless influenced by war or some other abnormal factor. In this period of depression the best statistics available show that the decline of foreign commerce has about kept pace with the falling off in domestic business. Does the Democratic Party suppose that by some magic power the Government could or would maintain foreign trade at its former volume while domestic industry is in a slump?

I want to say, Mr. President, that 90 per cent of what we hear about the destruction of our foreign trade is nothing more than the fabrication of misleading data. That is the only argument left to the antiprotectionists. Just a short time ago they were trying to convince the country that the tariff act of 1930 would bring about a tremendous inflation of prices and add $2,000,000,000 to the cost of living in the United States each year. Now, when commodity prices are only a fraction of what they were before the tariff act was passed, they have nothing to complain about except the fanciful "ruin" of American trade abroad.

Anyone who has examined the facts knows that most of the spectacular decline in the value of foreign trade—or all trade, for that matter—is accounted for by the decline in prices. No tariff barrier could maintain price levels in the face of a drastic depression throughout the world; but it is a fact of record, Mr. President, that prices in this country have declined much less than prices abroad. That is why the same critics look at the diminishing dollar sign on our import trade and close their eyes to the enormous bulk of foreign goods that are coming into the United States to displace the products of American factories and farms.

Let me call attention of the Senate to the Department of Commerce's analysis of foreign trade for 1931. It has this to say:

> The marked decline in the dollar value of our foreign trade during 1931 was attributable in large part to sharp decreases in price, which affected all classes of commodities. In physical volume exports showed a decline of about 20 per cent as compared with 1930, while imports were only 10 per cent smaller. Since domestic industrial production fell off 16 per cent and freight-car loadings dropped 19 per cent, it appears that the shrinkage of our foreign trade was about as great as the decline in domestic business, the decrease in exports being slightly larger and that in imports somewhat smaller.

During the first quarter of 1932 the volume of imports into this country was only 4 per cent lower than in the corresponding months of 1931, in spite of the fact that American production was curtailed from 16 to 20 per cent. Is the remedy for this situation a reduction of the American tariff, so that a greater volume of foreign goods may be poured upon our markets? If ever there was a time in the history of the United States when we need tariff protection, it is to-day when the markets of the world are glutted, thousands of factories and farms are turning out more than the limited purchasing power of the world can buy, and every producer is seeking an outlet market for his surplus. It would be sheer madness, Mr. President, to tamper with our protective system under such conditions.

It is very strange to listen to distinguished critics proclaim the destruction of our foreign trade when American exports still exceed those of any nation in the world.

I want Senators to mark that—American exports exceed those of any other country in the world. Is it possible that men with reason would think of tampering with the protective tariff, knowing the conditions in the world to-day, with the purchasing power of the peoples of the world shattered, with commodity prices 30 per cent lower than they were a few years ago? It is impossible to think such a thing.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I take it, the Senator does not think the tariff has caused this depression.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not.

Mr. LONG. Then what has?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I can explain it in just a few words to the Senator. The world can not destroy $200,000,000,000, the world can not destroy tens of millions of the flower of the manhood in the world, without having to pay the penalty; and she is paying it to-day, and we are paying our part of it.

Mr. LONG. The Senator means we are just now paying what the war cost, on account of destroying something?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. LONG. Have we not more wheat than we had before, more cotton than we had before, and more corn than we had before? What is it that we have not more of now than we had when this flowery condition existed?

Mr. SMOOT. There is more to it than cotton and wheat.

Mr. LONG. I am just trying to find out what caused this trouble. I know the Senator is one of the leading economists of this country, or of any country, and I am just one of the country boys fixing to go back home, and I want to find out what brought this trouble about. We have had you fellows here 12 years, and I would like to find out just what has caused the trouble. The Senator says the tariff has not caused it. What is the trouble?

Mr. SMOOT. The purchasing power of the world is destroyed. Take every man in this Chamber—perhaps not the Senator from Louisiana, but take every other man in the Chamber—take every farmer in the country, take every mechanic in the country, take every business man in the country, they are not producing what they did before, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. LONG. They can not buy.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not? Because they have not the money with which to buy.

Mr. LONG. Why have they not?

Mr. SMOOT. They have not it on account of the destruction of billions of property during the World War and the debts that were piled upon the people of the world. The debtors have to pay them sooner or later. The interest alone is enough to destroy business.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator permit another question along that line? We had about 12 years of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover prosperity here.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we did; decidedly so.

Mr. LONG. With advertisements even over the signatures of all three of these men to buy stocks and not to sell America short. What has occurred, and how did it occur, during these 12 years of prosperity, so that we are now in this economic distress? The tariff has not caused it, the Senator says. What has caused it?

Mr. SMOOT. It occurred because of the fact——

Mr. LONG. Did the war cause the prosperity of the Coolidge administration?

Mr. SMOOT. The Coolidge administration had prosperity while all the balance of the world was purchasing goods from us; yes.

Mr. LONG. Then the war caused the prosperity of the administration of Hoover, as long as it was prosperous, and of Coolidge and Harding. What we have now is what they did to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I say now that the prosperity that came to the United States, if it could be called prosperity, was added to by the war. Every person was paid an exceedingly high wage, and prices for commodities were high all the world over. The settlement day is here.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, does the Senator think we ought to have another war in order to get another 12 years of prosperity?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a silly question for any man to ask.

Mr. BYRNES. Is that not what the Senator's argument amounts to?

Mr. SMOOT. If I thought that anything that might produce prosperity in the United States would bring such trouble to the rest of the world, I would not support it.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator says that war brought prosperity. Is not that so?

Mr. SMOOT. I said that in part it brought temporary prosperity.

Mr. BYRNES. The war that caused 12 years of prosperity is now causing the depression?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not made any such statement, and the Senator need not try to put any such statement in my mouth.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMOOT. I refuse to yield any longer.

Mr. LONG. Just one more question.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I want to get through. I do not want all of this nonsense in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is not pleasant for members of the Democratic Party to listen to the facts, and all they are trying to do is to becloud the facts. The American people will know sometime what the facts are.

In the fiscal year of 1931 exports from the United States were valued at $3,033,700,000. No other nation came within the $3,000,000,000 class for the same period. Exports from Great Britain amounted to only $2,636,100,000, Germany exported goods valued at $2,524,400,000, and France sold $1,428,300,000 worth of her products abroad.

It is a significant fact, Mr. President, that the United States, which centers its attention upon domestic commerce, should have larger foreign markets than any other country, in spite of the fact that some of our closest competitors make international commerce their specialty. Great Britain, for example, must import foodstuffs and raw materials to live. By comparison the United States is largely self-contained. Only a few foreign products, such as rubber, silk, and tin, are essential to our economic well-being. Great Britain must sell her manufactured products abroad to pay for foodstuffs and raw materials. Foreign markets are an absolute necessity for her. But the United States sells more than 90 per cent of its output to the home market. In spite of this fundamental contrast between the trade philosophy of Europe and America, this country has a greater export market than any European nation. To speak of the collapse of American trade in the face of this fact is to trifle with veracity.

It is a matter of record, Mr. President, that we sold as large a percentage of our domestic output abroad before the war as we did in the heyday of 1929.

Department of Commerce records show that 9.7 per cent of our production went into foreign trade in the year before the war, compared with 9.8 per cent in 1929. During the interval, America underwent intensive industrial development, but we did not seek to exploit the world with our goods. American producers found it more advantageous to cultivate the home market by steadily advancing the standards of living. Our total production has been multiplied many fold, but the percentage of goods that are shipped abroad is considerably smaller than it was 30 years ago. Is there any reason, then, in assuming that prosperity will evade us until we find new foreign markets to exploit? American prosperity has never been based on exports abroad, and it probably never will be. Foreign markets are only a tiny supplement to our own immense market. While we can not guarantee to American manufacturers, labor, and agriculture a foreign outlet for their goods, we can and will safeguard the market they already have within the confines of the 48 States.

The facts clearly show, Mr. President, that the reduction of our export trade is due chiefly to lower purchasing power in foreign countries rather than to any desire on the part of other nations to punish us for protecting our home industry. The exports that suffered most were luxuries and articles used in ordinary industrial development which is now at a standstill. For example, the value of our automobile exports fell 47 per cent; the value of refined oils, principally gasoline, 47 per cent; manufactures of iron and steel, 51 per cent; and agricultural machinery and implements, 50 per cent. Our exports of necessities, such as cotton and silk manufactures, chemicals, and rubber products held up much better. These figures simply indicate that foreign nations have bought from us those products that they needed most in hard times.

Reasons for the decline in imports to the United States are similar. I defy the antiprotectionists to prove their charges that the tariff act of 1930 is the chief cause for the shrinkage in our imports. If they take the trouble to inquire from the Department of Commerce, they will learn that the value of free imports fell during 1931 as much as did the value of dutiable imports. In both instances the decline was slightly more than 32 per cent. Do the learned economists and statesmen who rail against the tariff contend that the duties levied by Congress in 1930 are responsible for the reduction of free imports?

This is an extremely embarrassing fact for them to contemplate. Hence, they seek to becloud the public mind. They try to convey the impression that the tariff has destroyed our foreign trade when indisputable figures show that more than two-thirds of the shrinkage in the dollar value of imports may be traced directly to commodities on the free list.

I anticipate an attempt to explain away this significant fact by the argument that most of our free imports are raw materials which have undergone a drastic price reduction. Nevertheless, there has been a steady demand for raw products, such as rubber, coffee, silk, and so forth. The prices of dutiable imports may not have fallen so low as those of the average free commodity. But luxuries and specialties, which constitute a large portion of the dutiable list, are not in great demand during a time of severe depression. The loss resulting from sharp price reductions for free imports is offset by the reduced demand for dutiable imports.

Free and dutiable imports reacted in the same general way toward the forces of depression. That fact can not be disputed. It takes the foundation from under the whole Democratic argument that the tariff has closed the American market to imports and destroyed our foreign trade.

Critics who lament the collapse of the foreign market for such products as cotton are apparently oblivious of the fact that the foreign shipments of American cotton were 5 per cent greater for 1931 than for 1930. Crude-petroleum exports were 8 per cent larger, and the shipments of tobacco fell off only slightly. Wheat exports were 16 per cent lower, and the volume of American meats consumed in foreign countries fell off 17 per cent. On the other hand, fruit exports registered a decided increase. There is no element of ruin in these figures. Buying power has been temporarily curtailed. But I have no doubt, Mr. President, that with the resumption of normal conditions our trade with other nations will continue to increase without the sacrifice of a single American industry.

I wish to direct the attention of the antiprotectionists to another significant fact in connection with our tariffs and trade. Most of our tariffs are levied against Europe. Only 42 per cent of our imports from that continent come in free, as compared with 67 per cent for the world as a whole. If the decline in our exports were a result of retaliation on the part of foreign countries affected by the American tariff, we could expect our heaviest loss of export trade in Europe. But that is not the case. In 1931 the value of our exports to Europe fell off 35 per cent. The decline in volume was, of course, much smaller. Europe remained our best customer in spite of the fact that most of our tariffs are levied against her products. Since the depression began Europe has bought a considerably larger portion of our exports than before.

Our trade with South America shows a remarkable contrast. Nearly 84 per cent of everything we import from the southern Republics comes in free. Yet our exports to that continent in 1931 fell off 53 per cent in value, or half as much again as did our exports to Europe. Asia is the only continent that showed a more moderate decline in the purchase of American exports than Europe. For the most part, those continents, whose goods come into the United States with almost no duty, bought proportionately less from us, and Europe, whose exports to America are mostly taxed, bought proportionately more from us.

The flimsy theory that our diminished foreign trade is due to retaliatory tariffs can not stand. Even if we should eliminate from consideration all figures and contemplate the bare fact that nations have been busy revising their tariffs ever since the war, only the most fantastic imagination could attribute these numerous revisions to the influence of the American tariff. Many nations have adjusted their duties skyward, both before and since the American tariff of 1930 became effective. Anyone who looks into the background of the world's economic conditions ought to realize that all nations have been actuated by the same influence—the desire to protect their own producers. The world has been deluged with more goods than the purchasing power of the people can buy. Every nation is seeking to dump surplus crops or excessive industrial output upon its neighbors. Woe to the market that is unprotected in these days of feverish production and underdeveloped purchasing power. The manufacture of goods of every kind and the growing of crops have become so easy that the world is overwhelmed by the results.

To suggest that this dilemma is a result of tariff barriers is to put the cart before the horse. Tariffs that have sprung up, like mushrooms, in nearly every part of the world in the last decade are a result and not the cause of economic maladjustments. So long as world economic conditions remain as they are, no other nation will relinquish the protection of its domestic markets; and if the United States should attempt to do so, as a gesture of economic good will, our people would become the victims of world-wide exploitation.

The idea of Congress revising the American tariff downward, according to its own judgment, but acting as nearly as possible in concert with other nations, is a grandiose pipedream. Tariffs are levied for the protection of home markets, not with a view to stimulating international trade. If the protective policy is to continue as a vital force in our industrial and agricultural systems, it must be based upon the interests of American and not foreign importers. No nation can be allowed to dictate what our tariffs should be. When Congress once more undertakes to revise the tariff, it should be in response to a demand from Americans and not foreign interests. At present there is no such demand. A few Democratic candidates seeking to capitalize the depression have indulged in reckless charges, but not one has had the courage to submit a measure containing specific duty reductions. Why? Because they realize that American producers are already in distress and that any additional concessions to importers could only add to the number of unemployed men and idle factories.

Let the Democrats who advocate an international tariff conference name the industries that would be denied protection as a concession to importers who seek greater privileges in the American market; let them specify what industries they would sacrifice to appease the purchasers of American automobiles and machinery abroad. Unless the Democratic Party comes forth with a tariff measure to correct the alleged "iniquities" of the 1930 act, about which its spokesmen are complaining to the high heavens, it will convict itself of gross hypocrisy before the bar of public opinion.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that the leaders of the Democratic Party in Congress are misled by European economic philosophy. They have borrowed the theories of the British and hence see no prosperity except that which comes from overseas. They put the United States in the position of a tiny state, like Belgium or Rumania, which must trade extensively with its neighbors to live. Apparently they are unable to comprehend the difference between the vast free-trade area of the 48 American States and the restricted confines of a European country. Where tariffs work an extreme hardship upon Europe with its myriad boundary lines, they make America with its endless and varied resources, its extensive market, and its high standards of living, the most prosperous Nation in the world.

The application of European policies will provide no solution for our economic difficulties. Suppose that Europe did succeed in reducing the economic barriers that separate one country from another. That would not obviate the necessity of equalizing the costs of production in the Old World with those of the United States. A substantial American tariff would still be necessary.

Public opinion has been stifled by misinformation as to the Republican tariff policy. For example, I read a few weeks ago in a magazine of reputable standing an article that purported to show that the Republican Party keeps building tariff barriers higher and higher simply because it is compelled by expediency to create a new issue for every campaign. To suggest that the Republican Party has written tariff acts that are contrary to its own best judgment is a slanderous falsehold that would be unworthy of answer were it not for the fact that this statement is part of an organized propaganda to discredit the tariff in the eyes of the American people.

I deny that the Republican Party has elevated tariff rates higher and higher without regard for the economic needs of our country. As a matter of fact, the average rate in the Smoot-Hawley Act is not as high as the corresponding average 30 years ago under the Dingley law. The best measuring rod we have for tariff barriers is the equivalent ad valorem rates. During the first six months under the 1930 act the average rate on dutiable items was 44 per cent. Under the Dingley law of 1897 the average rate reached as high as 52 per cent, and the average for the 12 years under this statute was in excess of 46 per cent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he believes it was in consequence of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill and whether or not it helped American laboring men when, after that act was passed, 246 American factories removed from Detroit, Mich., to Detroit, Canada, and many other American concerns transferred their plants to foreign countries, thereby employing foreign labor to make goods with American capital which had formerly been made by American capital in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator need not talk about that movement beginning recently. It was going on before the Smoot-Hawley bill was passed. Mr. Ford established a plant in Ireland; the United States Steel in France; the shoe interests in Czechoslovakia. American capital, American machinery, American foremen went to other countries where there is the cheapest labor in the world.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator think that moving these 246 American plants from Detroit, Mich., over to Detroit, Canada, and employing Canadian workmen, helped the American workman who was unemployed?

Mr. SMOOT. The wage scale in Canada is about the same as it is in America, and there must be some other reason.

Mr. TYDINGS. The fact that Canada can send her products to the whole British Empire without paying any duty makes a difference, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator wanted to ask me a question, and I have answered the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am now asking the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. When I get through with my remarks I will answer any question the Senator may ask.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator does not want to answer a question in direct opposition to what he is now saying, for the reason that it can not be answered, I will not insist on asking the question.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not in opposition to what I have said or to anything in the few remarks I am making. However, I am a protectionist and the Senator is not.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in 1909 the Republican Party revised the tariff downward, because it was convinced that the situation of the country warranted such action. The war saved the American people from economic difficulties when the Democratic Party riddled tariff rates in 1913. When the war was over it became imperative for the Republicans to reestablish the protective system to save the country from economic ruin. But the best measuring rods available indicate that the rates in the Fordney-McCumber law were not, on the whole, as high as those which prevailed at the beginning of the century.

Everyone who has given even superficial thought to the tariff act of 1930 knows that it was not a general revision upward, but that it was an adjustment to meet changing conditions. If Congress could have foreseen the conditions of world competition that now confront us, the rates might have been fixed considerably higher than they were. The Republican Party is not shackled to any impractical theory as to how high tariffs should be. We insist that they shall be high enough to protect American industry, labor, and agriculture against undue foreign competition. World conditions and not philosophical conjectures are the determining factor. In the intensity of economic competition among all nations and all people at this time it is a question of whether a greater and not a smaller degree of protection should be allowed to our own producers.

I deny that the rates and classifications of the 1930 tariff act operate as an embargo. Congress has set up a fact-finding agency—the Tariff Commission—which is charged with the duty of finding differences in the cost of producing the same or similar articles in the United States and the chief competing countries. During the last year the commission investigated and prepared reports on production costs for 72 different commodities. These commodities were the most controversial items in the last tariff bill. But the commission did not find them to be virtual embargoes. Thirty-nine of the seventy-two duties considered were found to equalize the costs of production here and abroad as nearly as that can be done. A few duties were found to be too low for that purpose, and some few were too high.

Where is there another country that bases its customs duties upon the differences in costs of production? Any importer who does not have an equal opportunity with American interests to sell upon our markets may appeal to the Tariff Commission to adjust the duty in question on the basis of different production costs. But the Democratic antiprotectionists would go farther than that. Their theory, as propounded upon the floor of this Senate, would give foreign producers a distinct advantage over our own people. When they plead for a policy of "the lowest production costs, living costs, transportation costs, and distribution costs," they ask that the American people voluntarily reduce themselves to a level with the peasants and paupers of Europe and Asia.

We have listened to the old and hollow story of the farmer being fettered by tariff shackles. Has anyone heard the farmers complain because of the tariff protection given them? Like all other groups they sometimes inveigh against the duties granted to other industries. That is a natural reaction. Every economic group would like to have as much protection as possible for its own members and as little as possible for other groups. But the farm organizations will not relinquish the advantages that were given them in the 1930 tariff act without a struggle.

The chief purpose of that act was to extend the protective policy to agriculture. Accordingly, the average agricultural rate was raised from 38 to 49 per cent, and a similar increase was allowed on articles manufactured from dutiable farm products. In contrast to this liberal allowance to agriculture, the average industrial rate was moved up from 31 to only 34 per cent.

Results from the agricultural tariff are remarkable in spite of the depression of prices. In the last year before the rates of 1930 became effective, agricultural imports were valued at about $300,000,000 more than agricultural exports. In the first year after the rates became effective this adverse balance of trade for agriculture was virtually wiped out. At the same time agricultural exports have held up much better than the exportation of manufactured articles.

Some Democrats would expose the farmer to the ravages of world competition, even in this age when surpluses are being produced everywhere, merely to vindicate a worn-out theory. How can they ignore the fact that 90 per cent of all the crops from American farms come directly into competition with foreign products of the soil. Argentina, Australia, and Canada can produce wheat, for example, at a fraction of the production cost in the United States. Soviet Russia is beginning to turn out vast crops of staple commodities, under the government monopoly, with almost no outlay for labor or land. These crops may be dumped upon the world market at any time. American farmers are liable to need more and not less protection.

Can the Democratic party speak for organized labor on the tariff? The plan of creating jobs by lowering the tariff so that the products of foreign labor may displace American goods is too puerile to need answer. Of course, American workingmen are more efficient than those of Europe. But even efficient workmen can't earn their bread and butter without industries to employ their talents. What we need in America is more and not fewer industries. Thousands of men are being displaced every year by machinery. We must create new industries to give them work, and not destroy the industries we already have for the benefit of importers.

The fundamental difference between the Republican and the Democratic policy is this: The Republicans would protect the industries we already have and encourage the cultivation of our 90 per cent domestic market, so that new industries may take root to give work to the unemployed. The Democrats, on the other hand, would begin by allowing foreign competition to destroy some of the industries that we already have in the vain hope that they might be able to expand our 10 per cent market abroad. If the proponents of the Democratic theories can make an appeal to the workingmen of America with such a proposition, then I have very seriously underestimated the intelligence of our citizens.

This Government should have no apology to make for reserving America for Americans. That has been our traditional policy ever since the United States became a nation. We have refused to participate in the political intrigues of Europe, and we will not compromise the independence of this country for the privilege of serving as schoolmaster for the world. In economics as in politics, the policy of this Government is, "America first." The Republican Party will not stand by and see economic experimenters fritter away our national heritage.

Critics have referred to our "economic nationalism" as if it were a term of reproach. On the contrary, it suggests the wisdom and soundness of the policy that has brought America into the rôle of the world's leading nation. In this hour of realities only fanatics dream of a day when national boundaries will be razed. At present national well-being, national prosperity, and national development are the only rod we have to cling to. We may expect the internationalists to expound the glories of world economic cooperation, but we must face the hard and cold fact that every nation is looking out for its own self-interests. And we must do likewise. To invite other nations to sit down with us at a council table and adjust our tariffs could lead in no other direction than toward calamity for the American people. Let the internationalists continue to dream of new streams of commerce flowing across the Atlantic and the Pacific and surpluses disappearing into rich foreign markets, ignoring the pitiful lack of purchasing power of the distressed countries of Europe, Asia, and South America. The Republican Party will not be tempted to share that reverie. It has a responsibility to the people to keep itself well grounded upon the basic element of common sense. Adversity makes it more and not less necessary that we preserve the American heritage, and we reserve the major share of our markets for our own producers.

MERGER OF DISTRICT STREET RAILWAYS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 154 to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has sought for some little time to secure the consideration of a measure of interest to the District of Columbia. I should be glad to see his measure considered by the Senate, but it seems to me that the opposition is so determined that it will probably be impossible for him to secure consideration for it. I have an appropriation bill, which has passed the House of Representatives, which I am very anxious to have considered. I therefore should like to ask the Senator if he has not about reached the conclusion that the wise thing probably to do would be to withdraw his motion for the consideration of his bill at this time?

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, at the conclusion of a very brief statement I will withdraw the motion, but I should like, if the Senator will yield for that purpose, to say a few words regarding it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. I am glad to do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to make just a brief statement. The Congress of the United States is the sole sanctuary for the people of the District of Columbia in distress, and in this instance distress can be alleviated, I think, by such a business measure as the pending House joint resolution. This joint resolution is nothing more——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. I would rather the Senator from Vermont would conclude his statement, unless he thinks we ought to have a quorum called. Then I will make a motion to take up a bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. So far as I am concerned, I would yield for a quorum, but I think it is up to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Would the Senator like to have a quorum called?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think it would be wise, in view of what is taking place here.

Mr. JONES. Very well; I will yield to the Senator from Oregon to make the suggestion.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Davis	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Dickinson	Keyes	Schall
Bailey	Dill	King	Sheppard
Barbour	Fletcher	La Follette	Shipstead
Barkley	Frazier	Lewis	Shortridge
Bingham	George	Long	Smoot
Black	Glass	McKellar	Steiwer
Blaine	Glenn	McNary	Stephens
Borah	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Gore	Morrison	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Hale	Moses	Townsend
Bulow	Harrison	Neely	Trammell
Byrnes	Hastings	Norbeck	Tydings
Capper	Hatfield	Norris	Vandenberg
Cohen	Hayden	Nye	Wagner
Connally	Hebert	Patterson	Walcott
Costigan	Howell	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Couzens	Johnson	Reed	Watson
Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the people of the District of Columbia for years have knocked at the doors of Congress for admittance and for a hearing upon an important question of relief which has not been limited to this period of depression. The people of the District of Columbia have been in need of relief from the waste which necessarily exists whenever two street-railway lines occupy the same streets of the same city, as do the two street railways which are sought to be united by this joint resolution.

As some evidence of the extent to which the people have besought Congress to act in this matter, I call attention to the names of some of the citizens' organizations which the record shows have applied here:

Washington Chamber of Commerce, Washington Board of Trade, Merchants & Manufacturers' Association, Washington Central Labor Union, Washington Society of Engineers, Progressive Citizens' Association of Georgetown, Central Business Men's Association, and Northeast Washington Citizens' Association.

It also goes without saying, but I should like to have it made a part of this record, that the owners of both of these street railways—and by "owners" I mean the stockholders as well as the officers of the corporations—have come to Congress asking Congress to effect this merger.

The joint resolution now pending in the Senate is a mere instrumentality to carry out a privilege and authority granted by Congress to these companies to do the act which they seek to do here now. This is a joint resolution merely to carry into effect a law passed by Congress in 1925; but this matter has been pending for approximately 15 years, and it is not prematurely brought here, as claimed. The essence of this measure, all the material elements of this measure, have been under consideration by the following boards and institutions of government:

The District Commissioners; Bureau of Efficiency; Director and staff of the Bureau of Accounts of the Interstate Commerce Commission; National Capital Park and Planning Commission; Public Utilities Commission; an expert, Doctor Maltbie, whose opinion was cited here a few days ago, now the head of the New York State Public Utility Commission, who was employed as an independent expert by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia for that purpose, and who made a written report which has been here on file and in the RECORD for years; the House Committee on the District of Columbia; and the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia for several sessions.

So we find this joint resolution, after it has passed the House, early on the calendar of the Senate. At the earliest possible time during this session it was brought up for consideration, objected to from time to time; once, on a motion to proceed to its consideration, voted down; and now, on a motion for a simple hearing, what do we find? An organized plan to prevent even a consideration of this measure; an organized plan to prevent its becoming the unfinished business of the Senate.

Being so confronted in the late hours of this session, and realizing the importance of the measure of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I am about to withdraw my motion. Before doing so, however, I wish to call attention to this significant language.

During the discussions which have occurred here since I made my motion some very able speeches have been made alluding to improper practices by so-called power trusts in this land, and practices which were very vigorously condemned. It ought to give some merit to our position here, representing the people of the District of Columbia in their only legislature, that paragraph 5 on page 7 of this joint resolution provides:

> That the original bonded indebtedness and stock liability of the new company shall not be in excess of the total amount of the stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness then outstanding against the Capital Co. and the Washington Co.

So, Mr. President, I do not want this occasion to go by without alluding to the fact that there is not one drop of water in this proposed merger.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt the Senator thinks that is the case; but if the Senator will examine into the history of these two companies he will find that practically all of the stock is watered stock, and a whole lot of the bonds are likewise watered bonds.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the information which I have, and which I think is considerable, leads me to believe that there is not to-day 1 cent of stock or bonds that is not represented by property, not merely 100 cents on the dollar but in normal times more than 100 cents on the dollar; and when the time comes we will meet that claim.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is dealing with a District problem which to my own personal knowledge has been at the bar of the Senate for five years; and if our precedents are any criterion, it will be here five more years before there is any action. That is no reflection on the Senate, because the Senate finds itself concentrated upon its larger responsibilities in the country as a whole.

I ask the Senator whether, in the face of this contemplation and his experience with it, he does not believe that the existing method, by which the Congress undertakes to be a common council for the District of Columbia, has come to be wholly outworn, inadequate, and unfair to the District itself, and that a fundamental responsibility upon us is to rewrite an organic act which will permit sufficient District of Columbia autonomy to allow problems of this importance in the District to have their day in court and their proper decision?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have given that thought some consideration, and my present view of the matter is that there is merit in the proposal. Certainly my experience in connection with this merger leads me to believe that it is extremely difficult to get any practical progress with a matter that is controversial and which relates to the District of Columbia and not to the country in general.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I am about to conclude.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering if the Senators from Michigan and Vermont did not know that the people of Washington at one time had one of these autonomous governments. It was run head over heels in debt, and the people of Washington themselves petitioned the Federal Government to take it over.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am withdrawing this motion at this time for two reasons. One is the obvious situation that we are in, nearing the end of the session, which leads me to doubt that it is wise to hold up the entire Senate with this motion at this time. The other is the importance of the measure which is alluded to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

I now withdraw my motion, with thanks for the good will of so many Senators who have knowledge of this measure, and who, I believe, will be glad to support it whenever an opportunity can be given it.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Vermont takes his seat, will he yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. If the Senator from Utah desires to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont, of course I yield.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask the Senator whether any effort had been made to secure an understanding, akin to that which was obtained with respect to the Philippine bill, that this measure may be made the unfinished business at a given time when Congress meets in December, or that it shall follow the Philippine measure, or some other measure which may take its place, and be regarded as the unfinished business.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield further——

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Such an effort was made in earnest, and, so far as I know, every possible means of persuasion was employed to that end and all efforts failed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say, if the Senator from Washington will pardon me, with reference to this matter——

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KING. Without any particular reference to the bill under consideration, I think it must be obvious to everyone that there should be a merger of the two railroads which are now occupying the streets of this city. I can not quite account for the long delay that has occurred in accomplishing this result. I know that Congress itself urged—and I am not sure that that urging was not by virtue of a resolution or an act—the railroad companies to try to merge and to submit a plan of merger. They did submit a plan when the able Senator from Michigan was a member of the committee, as I recall, and that plan, as well as other suggested plans, was referred to Doctor Maltbie, employed by the committee because of his knowledge of the subject and the fact that he was regarded as fair and impartial, and when the plan was submitted we attempted to crystallize it into a bill and have it enacted into law.

I will not comment upon the reasons for the delay. It is only unfortunate that we can not secure action upon some measure. I am not committed to any measure, and I am sure the people of the District of Columbia are not committed to any particular measure, but they do want action, and I think the Senate has failed to discharge its duty in not passing in former years a genuine and fair and proper and sound measure for the merging of these two railway companies. I sincerely hope that when Congress meets in December the Senator from Vermont and other members of the committee will join in this or some other bill and try to secure action in regard to it.

One further observation. May I say to my friend from Michigan that efforts have been made to have the people of the District agree upon a plan to enlarge the jurisdiction of the commissioners, and to commit to the commissioners greater authority than that which they now possess. Unfortunately, the people of the District have not been united in the powers which they were willing to confer upon the District Commissioners, or, so far as I can discover, upon some other body subordinate in character to the Congress. When the citizens of the District of Columbia can unite upon a policy and upon a measure increasing the power and authority of the commissioners to deal with these local problems, I feel sure that Congress will be responsive to their demands.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think this opportunity ought to go by without some member of the Committee on the District of Columbia attesting the intelligent, the comprehensive, and the fair conduct of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] in the consideration of this problem. He has done his work thoroughly and tolerantly, and I think it is a misfortune that practices have been resorted to in order to defeat the considered judgment of the Committee on the District of Columbia expressed over and over again. If we shall defer action upon this problem, and other kindred problems, until all the people of the District of Columbia shall unite, we shall never have anything done either as to this problem or as to the schools, or as to any other problem which has been considered in the 10 years I have been a member of the committee.

It is to be deplored that a measure to which so much of intelligent consideration has been given, particularly by the Senator from Vermont, should have been treated in this unreasonable fashion. I would not like to say and could not say temperately what I think of it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield to me, I merely want to take a second of the time of the eminent Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, not always being able to attend all the sessions but having attended many of the sessions where this subject was considered, I beg to add my approbation of the work of the distinguished Senator from Vermont, and I adopt the language of the Senator from Virginia, to which I give my indorsement.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to join with these Members of the Senate in their kind words with reference to the Senator from Vermont, and I also desire to express my sincere appreciation of his kind consideration in the matter, and in the action he has taken. I hope the measure he has had in charge may soon be brought up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. For what purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. I want to say some kind words about the Senator from Utah when the Senator from Washington has finished saying kind words about the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JONES. Will not the Senator wait until I get my motion acted on?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I will be glad to do that.

WHEAT AND COTTON FOR THE RED CROSS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 461, making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Is the motion debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable.

Mr. KING. I shall claim recognition before the question is put.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 4940) to provide temporary aid to agriculture for the relief of the existing national economic emergency.

The message announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing, during the year 1932.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, and that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 46 and 47 to the bill.

THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—REPLY TO SENATOR SMOOT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate long, but I want to make some observations with reference to the speech my friend the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just made touching the tariff.

Of course, those of us who have been here for quite a while have heard this speech so often, and know so well its purposes, that when we heard that this might be the last day of the session we were not surprised that the Senator from Utah should make a tariff speech. Especially did we feel no surprise when we reflected that the Senator from Utah is to come up for reelection this year, and he, in common with all other Republican Senators, will have a mighty hard fight on his hands.

I want to express my personal high regard of the Senator from Utah before he journeys forth, either to-night or to-morrow night, out into what is this year the strong Democratic State of Utah, to meet the forces in political combat next November. We all like the Senator from Utah personally. We wish for him every pleasure and happiness. But when it comes to politics—well, just as much as I like him personally, I dislike him politically.

The Senator from Utah started out in his speech on the tariff by citing the records of Democratic Senators on the tariff, saying, in substance, that they were all spotted protectionists. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] has made the same argument; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], over the radio and elsewhere, has made the same argument; and the Senator from Utah a dozen times or more has made that argument.

The reason for that is quite plain. It is that they want to divert public attention and try to fool somebody and escape the consequences of their own nefarious conduct in dealing with the tariff question.

Mr. President, the Senator says that we make misleading statements about the President and about the administration. He was alluding to the speech of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] this morning. Permit me to say that the speech of the Senator from Arkansas to-day was one of the strongest deliverances that has been made in this Chamber in a long time. No wonder the Senator from Utah felt that he should say something with reference to that speech, because it cut to the quick. It laid on the table the bare hypocrisy of this administration and unfolded to the country the misleading statements of the Secretary of War in his speech last night. It was a splendid presentation of the political issues in this campaign, and the Senator from Utah will hear of it many times in the campaign as he confronts the people of Utah.

Talk about Democrats making misleading statements about this administration! We have been the best friends the administration has had. If it had not been for some of us on this side of the aisle pointing out some of the shortcomings of the administration and helping Republican Senators to put over some of the administration policies, they would have been in a bad fix. Indeed, if they had followed our advice more, they might have had a record such that they could praise.

The only mistakes I have made in my votes in the Senate have been in following some of the administration propositions. I did that apologetically, because I hoped we might help the country in its dire distress, and I accepted even doubtful formulas. The only defense I will have to make for such votes is that I was trying to help the country.

You can have all the honor you want about the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Some of us voted for the act establishing that body, but I reckon we will answer for it for years to come. It did some good, and I hope it will do more; but you would never have put it over if it had not been for Democratic votes, mine among others. If there was ever a nonpartisan piece of legislation, it was the proposal for the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. There are any number of other propositions Mr. Hurley claims as a credit for the administration which we passed in a nonpartisan way, trying the best we could to help in this situation.

The Senator from Utah, in his tariff speech, undertook to praise the so-called Smoot-Hawley bill. He had more courage in doing that than did the Republicans who were assembled at Chicago recently. They were frightened at it. They would not even touch it. Indeed, they did not mention it in the platform or in those glorious and eloquent speeches that were presented to that great, quiet, unenthusiastic assemblage of Republicans at Chicago.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did not the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] "paramount" it in his opening speech?

Mr. HARRISON. He may have apologized for it, but the Republican platform did not mention the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. If I am mistaken about that, I want my good friend the Senator from Utah—because he is indeed entitled to all the credit for any tariff legislation that bears his name—to correct me and tell us whether it was mentioned. Do we not know that if the Republicans had thought it would have been a credit to the Republican Party in the campaign they would have praised the Smoot-Hawley tariff law? Yet they did not do it. My friend the Senator from Utah did not attend the convention, and I do not know whether he sent word to them not to mention it or whether those fellows who were there writing the platform had better political judgment than he and, if he had told them to do it, would not have done it. Anyway, it was not praised or mentioned in the Republican platform.

Mr. GORE. The platform was too short.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it was too short. I think it occupied only one page in the metropolitan press and contained only about 17,000 words, while our platform, I think, contained about a thousand words and could almost be written upon a postal card. And yet we did not shirk the duty. We did not run at the mention of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. We courageously stepped up and in a few short, crisp, truthful words we condemned it in the strongest possible language. We are perfectly willing, may I say to my agreeable friend from Utah, to go to the country this year on the issue of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

My friend the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] asked the Senator from Utah what was the cause of this economic disaster. The answer of the Senator from Utah was just as clear as his answers usually are. I wrote it down at the time he said it. When he was asked if the Smoot-Hawley tariff law did not bring on this economic collapse, he said, "No; it was the purchasing power of the world." Everybody understands that answer. When he was pressed for a further answer the Senator from Utah said, "No; it was not the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. It was because the World War destroyed millions of men and billions of property and revised profits"—a perfectly good answer and right to the point. That, he said, was the cause of the economic collapse.

But the facts will not be denied. The Senator may get all the figures he wants to show that the average of rates in the Smoot-Hawley law is below the average of the Dingley law and that the average is not as high, but he can not make a person in the country believe it, because it is not true. Everybody knows it, and I am surprised that the Senator from Utah did not admit that the present tariff law is the highest that has ever been put upon the statute books in the history of the United States. He wanted the rates to climb higher and higher and higher. It is true that under the Dingley law there were more things on the free list than there are now, so the Senator might work in the free list and get some sort of an average, but the tariff rates on imports into the United States were higher under the Smoot tariff law than ever before, and yet they are not high enough now for the distinguished Senator from Utah. He is willing, brave as he is, to go back to Utah and risk his political life on this proposition.

Some one asked the Senator from Utah about the tariff on oil and he evinced some surprise. He said there was no need until recently for a tariff on oil and that it is only in very recent years that the question has come up.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator from Mississippi is a little in error. I think the Senator from Utah said he had always supported a tariff on oil.

Mr. HARRISON. I am just coming to that. The tariff on oil was proposed in 1922 by no less a person than the present Republican candidate for the Vice Presidency, who presides over this body. My friend from Utah did not support him in those days. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was being given consideration the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] had something to say about it, as shown by the RECORD. When my friend spoke about it in answer to a question, I looked up the RECORD to see if I was mistaken, because I thought the Senator from Utah had opposed a tariff on oil in the past. He was recorded as voting against a tariff on oil in 1930 when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was before the Senate. Not until the time when he wanted to get a tariff on copper, so that he might go back to Utah this year and tell them what he had done for copper, was he willing to take oil into the combination that finally put it over.

May I say I have never seen a more zealous and persistent fighter for any tariff than my friend from Utah was during the consideration of the tax bill with reference to the tariff on copper. When he was beaten one time he was not defeated. He came back stronger than ever. When my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] voted on one phase of the oil question, as I believe it was—on one occasion he did not vote for a tariff on copper, but he finally shifted around—the Senator from Utah was alert and right on the job. He knew how to get them back into the fold. He worked overtime doing that. He was not even for Hoover's furlough plan when it came to that. He worked at that time to get his copper tariff. Not until copper became involved was he in favor of a tariff on oil, and in order to put it over he was willing to accept oil, lumber, coal, and anything else.

Mr. President, it takes indeed a very courageous person in the political life of the country to-day to undertake to defend the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. More than a thousand economists prophesied what was going to happen and pleaded with the Senator from Utah and the President of the United States not to put over that legislative monstrosity; but they plowed ahead, they had their program mapped out, they went on to its completion, and the President finally attached his signature to it.

That is one of the troubles with the present President of the United States. I think he is a very well-meaning man, but, oh, what a procrastinator he is. How indecisively does he work. With what uncertainty does he proceed.

When the tariff bill was before the Senate, with what hesitancy did he take a stand. Here was the Senator from Utah saying, "We need these high rates." Here was the progressive element of the Republican Party, led by distinguished gentlemen like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and others over on the other side of the Chamber. Did the President take his stand with the progressive element of his party? No! No one could find out how he stood. He was afraid he might make this element mad or that element mad in his party, and so in this spineless way he groped along, letting the Republican leadership of this body write the Smoot-Hawley tariff law which started the economic collapse in this country.

The Senator from Utah may smile; but I say to him that he should look outside and see men walking the streets, tired and hungry. He should go back to the mines of his State and see them closed and men out of jobs. When some one says to him, "It is because of the tariff bill that you fathered that this condition came about," he may smile; but there are millions of men and women in America who believed from the very time of the introduction of that bill that it meant closing the doors to the sale of our products in foreign lands, a shutting down of our factories, and increase in unemployment. It meant isolating ourselves in trade and commerce and a beginning of a retreat in our economic progress.

Sneer at it, gentlemen of the Republican Party; scoff at it if you will, but you have to answer to the American people this time and it will not be such an answer as the Senator from Utah gave when he was asked if the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill had not driven factories from the United States. "Oh," he said, "that has been done before; they have been going abroad for years. Mr. Ford 15 years ago put his plants into Ireland and some other concern built a plant somewhere else." That will not answer the American people, because the Senator's own Department of Commerce statistics show that practically $1,000,000,000 in property investment, after the beginning of the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, found its way into foreign countries, there to be invested, there to be expended for construction of factories, there to be used in giving employment to foreign labor to produce articles to be sold in competition with our own products. When the Senator looks at the hundreds of thousands of unemployed in Pittsburgh, Detroit, and other cities of the country, he must realize that they all know that he forced American factories to be built abroad because of his selfish, narrow, isolated policy on the tariff question.

The Senator from Utah undertook to pay a tribute to the lamented McKinley, a great Republican, a man who had splendid ideas with reference to the tariff and other questions, and who had fixed principles in his heart and mind. Let me quote from that distinguished man.

If he knew that the Senator from Utah and others of his party were trying to implant upon the American people the policies which they advocated in the framing of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, McKinley would turn over in his grave.

He would not want anyone in the same connection to mention his name on the floor of the United States Senate. Here is what McKinley said. He said it in the very last speech he made. He said it at Buffalo on the very occasion at which he was shot. Let us see how different it is from the Republican idea of to-day. He had such ideas as were incorporated by the Democratic leadership in this body, backed by the solid Democratic vote here and in the House, and which we tried to place on the statute books of the country and made every effort to have adopted as the policy of trade and commerce of the United States with the nations of the world. That was the policy which the Senator from Utah criticized and condemned as an unwise policy. But it was an unwise policy which was believed in by the great Republican protectionist, the martyred McKinley. Here is what he said:

> Our industrial enterprises which have grown to such great proportions affect the homes and occupations of the people and the welfare of the country. Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets require our urgent and immediate attention.

What wise words were those!

> Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more.

Let me read that again to the Senator from Utah, who would not follow any such wise policy as that. He wants us to withdraw like a turtle in his own shell and live to ourselves. He does not want to trade with foreign countries; he does not want to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries. He does not want any world economic conference. He wants tariffs so high that nothing can come into the United States. McKinley said:

> Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more.

Further, he said:

> By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities, a mutual exchange, is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in the fancied security that we can fofever sell everything and buy little or nothing.

Listen, I ask the senior Senator from Utah:

> If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

What wise words were those! How greatly to the interest of the Republican Party it would be, what confidence it would inspire in the hearts of the American people, if they would follow the wise principles and policies laid down by the lamented McKinley instead of those of the author of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, in which the Republicans did not have enough confidence to mention in their platform.

> The period of exclusiveness is passed.

Let me read that again. Let me burn it into the hearts of my Republican colleagues. When they go out on the hustings during the campaign, instead of seeking to deceive the people on the tariff question will they not get a copy of McKinley's speech and read a little bit of it to them, read to them, at any rate, this part of that speech:

> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times, measures of retaliation are not.

And yet day by day and week by week and month by month, with a President twiddling his thumbs and saying nothing, Senators on the majority side of the Chamber pressed the consideration of this tariff monstrosity, which resulted in isolating this country, in destroying all hope for an enlargement of our foreign trade and commerce, and in making foreign peoples angry with us, causing the organization of cartels and boycotts in foreign countries. They went madly to work and did a good job in wrecking our country.

The wonderful achievements of the Republican Party! I wish I had time, Mr. President, to go down the line and properly expose the hypocritical actions of the administration. In the speech of Secretary Hurley, as published this morning in the press, he makes a statement which I thought he was too big to make. I did not think that this great Secretary of War—and Republican Senators need not smile when I say the "great" Secretary of War—would make a statement such as this:

> Is he condemning the Wilson Democratic administration for having given the allied nations nearly all the money the American taxpayers owned and asking in return not even a definite promise to pay? Is he going to lift that burden that his chieftain placed on American taxpayers?

He was asking that question of the standard bearer of the Democratic Party and charging the Democratic administration during the war with having put this burden upon the taxpayers of America. I did not think that politics had become so degenerate; I did not believe that men could become so partisan as to charge the Democratic administration of President Wilson with putting upon the people the burden of taxation due to war necessities and to the conduct of the war.

How different was the attitude of the great Secretary of War who served during the World War from that of the present great Secretary of War under Mr. Hoover! This gentleman is playing politics in his office and charging that the Democratic Party is responsible for the burden of debt in this country due to the prosecution of the war, while his predecessor during the war refused to play politics in any instance, so far as I have ever heard. The one fault I found with Newton D. Baker when Secretary of War was that I could not get any closer to him than a Republican could get; and I like to get a wee bit closer to my own Secretary of War than a Republican can get; and I do not mind a Republican Senator getting closer to a Republican Secretary of War than I can get. However, it must be said to the credit of Newton D. Baker as Secretary of War that he played no politics in that high office; that a Republican could get as much as a Democrat could get; that he was for prosecuting the war and carrying the orders of the illustrious Wilson to victory and to glory. But the present Secretary of War, speaking to Ohio Republicans last night, charges the whole foreign debt and all the taxes that have been put upon the American people to the Wilson administration, because that administration prosecuted the war.

Ah, Mr. President, whatever glories came from that war are not glories of the Democratic Party. I am proud that the Democrats were at the head of the Government at that time, and I do not believe that any other administration could have rendered finer service to the Nation than was performed by President Wilson and his splendid Cabinet—all honor to them—but the war was not won by Democrats any more than by Republicans. The brave lads who are buried in "Flanders field," as well as all who served their country, whether they be Republicans or Democrats, deserve full credit. Their unselfish and patriotic service is the priceless glory of the whole country; and no Democrat or Republican can detract from it—and it will not reflect credit upon any administration or any Cabinet officer now to try to raise the skeleton of the war and blame the Democrats for the part we played in it. In that war was written one of the finest chapters of American history. The insinuation that the Democratic standard bearer or the Democratic Party may favor lifting the foreign debt and placing it on the backs of the American people is unworthy of the Secretary of War. Could stronger language be employed to convey a party's plans than is found in the Democratic platform? It speaks directly and clearly against the cancellation of the foreign debt. How different with the party of the Secretary of War. On that question, important as it is, his platform is as silent as the tomb.

Mr. President, I have said about all I want to say. The issue is joined on many things. We are perfectly willing to fight it out in Utah and elsewhere on the tariff question; but, before I close, inasmuch as I presume the Congress is going to adjourn to-night or to-morrow, I want to express myself here on one other question, because I am going to do it in the campaign.

I have not recently said anything about the prohibition question. I have been classed as a dry; I have voted that way consistently; I have never voted any other way.

It has been amusing to me to hear my good friend the "Tall Sycamore" from Connecticut, day after day, in grand parade, as he pranced this floor, prate about the beer question and the liquor question. I do not know just when it was he started, but it was about the same time that he decided he would run for reelection as Senator from Connecticut. So, in order to curry a little favor, he got busy and he has been very busy. Of course, the people of Connecticut will wonder why he did not have any influence with his Republican friends at Chicago and in the Senate so that he could get them to stand for his position, but he did not have. He has made his motive plain; he is playing politics.

Here is my position on this question. It may not suit some people, but I myself do not expect and I do not want to see my colleagues to pull out of the fire the chestnuts of Senators on the other side. I am perfectly willing to go to the country on the declarations of the two platforms on the prohibition question in the coming campaign. There is one thing about it—there is no uncertainty about the Democratic position; it is clear; there is no equivocation about it and no ambiguity. I voted in the resolutions committee for the report of the subcommittee that drafted a submission plank. That went about as far as I wanted it to go. As a matter of fact, I would not have gone that far if it had not been for the recommendations submitted. But, the other plank having been adopted, I am for it; I expect to speak for it; and I expect to vote that way after the 4th day of March, if I am given an opportunity to do so. No one can charge me now with helping you out of your troubles in New Jersey—and I am looking at the Senator from New Jersey now.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. Gladly; I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I am delighted to hear the Senator is going to vote for a submission of this question to the people. The whole country is very anxious to have a chance to vote on it. I congratulate the Senator, but I should like to have him vote on it a little bit before the 4th of next March.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the Senator is delighted I am going to do it, and he congratulates me——

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Why did not the Senator use his influence and power with his own Republican colleagues and Republican President to do what we are going to do? The Senator from New Jersey wishes that I would vote that way earlier than the 4th of March. I am wondering if he knows, because he is close to the gentleman in the White House, how the President feels about the proposition, and does he agree with the President in his position on the prohibition question?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I would be delighted to tell the Senator if I knew.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I knew the Senator did not know; nobody knows.

Mr. KEAN. The President has not confided in me any more than he has confided in the Senator from Mississippi, but if we should pass a joint resolution repealing the eighteenth amendment it would not be necessary for it to go to the President of the United States; it would go to the people for a vote, without the signature of the President.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I understand, then, it does not make any difference how the President feels about the proposition. Is that right?

Mr. KEAN. It makes a difference to you.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, it does; it makes a lot of difference to me, and it ought to make some difference to the people of New Jersey. Yet the distinguished Senator from New Jersey says it makes no difference how the President feels on this question. I am wondering whether when the Senator speaks in New Jersey during the coming campaign he is going to tell them then what he is telling the Senate now—that it makes no difference how the President stands on the prohibition question. The Senator has said he does not know how the President stands. If in November the Senator is going to stand by the remarks he has just made, I hope he will keep his seat; but if when he gets on the hustings he is going to shift his position and take a different one from that he has just taken I hope he will now rise and tell us he is going to do that. Of course, if he does that, it will be in keeping with the antics of other Republicans, who change their position about every other day, and when he keeps his seat and says nothing he is following the leadership of President Hoover, who has kept quiet and said nothing on this question up until now.

So, Mr. President, I am trying to do, in these few remarks, what President Hoover has not the courage to do. If the Senator from New Jersey would follow his own inclination he would agree with me that the President ought to express himself now as to how he stands on this question. I stand upon the Democratic platform. I expect to follow the platform. I expect in March, when we have a President Roosevelt in the White House, and a Democratic Senate here, and a Democratic House of Representatives, to vote "aye" on a resolution to submit the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to conventions in the several States; and I have not any doubt that on this side of the aisle the great majority if not all of Democrats will do the same thing. Indeed, I know of no Democrat who would fail to do that under the circumstances, because we are going to the people upon that plank in this campaign.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator has said that he would vote to submit the repeal of the eighteenth amendment if he had a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House and a Democratic President in the White House. I say I will vote that way whether we have a Republican or a Democratic Senate and House and President.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, that is all right. I do not care how the Senator votes. [Laughter.] It does not make much difference, anyhow. He ought to exercise some of his influence with some of his party colleagues.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say, in line with the observations of the Senator from Mississippi, that during the last three days I have had a poll made of the 47 Democratic Members of the Senate. A few of them have been away from the Capitol, and to them we have sent telegrams. This poll has elicited the views of over 40 Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle. I am glad to say that about 95 per cent of them are in complete accord with voting for the plank in the Democratic platform when we get in power.

Mr. HARRISON. Now I want to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether there are any other planks in the Republican platform that he repudiates.

Mr. KEAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator for the Democratic plank on prohibition, or the Republican plank on prohibition?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, when I ran for the United States Senate I announced that if I came here I would vote to modify the Volstead Act, and I have consistently kept that promise. Now, the Democratic plank says that they will immediately modify the Volstead Act, and I ask the Senator from Mississippi what he has done toward that.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to answer the Senator from New Jersey. He can not ask me a question that I will not answer. If the Senator would be just as frank with me as I am going to be with him, the country would understand how we stand on the proposition. Now will not the Senator be equally candid with me? What plank does he favor—the Republican plank on prohibition or the Democratic plank on prohibition?

Mr. KEAN. I favor the Republican plank as drawn and submitted by the delegates from New Jersey, which was for direct repeal.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and that was repudiated; was it not? That was voted down, was it not? And the Senator was not there trying to help put it through, either; was he? No; he stayed here.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I was honored by the people of New Jersey with election as a delegate at large; but I felt that my duty here was such that I could not go away, and I stayed here.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the convention would have been in a worse fix or we would have been in a worse fix if the Senator had been there or here [laughter]; but I want the Senator to answer my question.

The Senator has told us now that he was for the plank that was submitted by the New Jersey Republicans at the Chicago Republican convention, but that was voted down. Now we have the plank on prohibition as proposed by the Democrats and adopted by the Democrats, and the one that was adopted by the Republicans. Which does the Senator favor?

Mr. KEAN. I am still for the New Jersey plank, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that the New Jersey plank, as proposed at the Republican convention in Chicago, was as good as or better than the plank as adopted by the Democrats at Chicago?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator thinks it was a better one?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will hear from that again. The Senator would rather have had that one than the Democratic plank, as I understand?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, I want the Senator to explain to us what that plank was, as submitted by the Republicans of New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. That plank——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator does that, the Senator from Mississippi will lose the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I would run the risk of losing the floor just to get an answer from the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will yield the floor if he permits the Senator from New Jersey to answer him, and the Senator from New Jersey will be recognized. Does the Senator from New Jersey wish to answer the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator want to take me off the floor? Is that the reason why he is answering?

Mr. KEAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may answer my question without my losing the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair is going to get this matter through. The Senator from Mississippi can not yield for a speech without losing the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Mr. President, of course I do not blame the Vice President for protecting the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has not answered my question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has no right to ask a question. The Senator from Mississippi can yield for a question.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for a question, if the Senator wants to ask me a question.

Mr. President, I think we understand the Senator from New Jersey. I say that I stand on the Democratic platform. I expect after the 4th of March, when this question is submitted to the Senate to vote for a resolution submitting the question to conventions in the several States. I will go farther. Living up to my platform, if I were a delegate to the convention in my State where this matter was submitted to it, I would feel in duty bound to vote to adopt that repeal. If, after that is done, the question comes up in my State as to whether or not I should turn away from prohibition within the State, modify the law or repeal it, I should vote against it. I shall vote, as a citizen of Mississippi, to hold to and maintain prohibition within the State; but as a Democratic Senator from that State, on or after the 4th day of March, if the question comes up here, I shall vote to submit the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to conventions in the several States.

"Why do you not vote for it now?" some one will ask. That is a perfectly proper question from a Republican source. We adopted a platform out there in Chicago, and you did, too. It is to be a sounding board reflecting the views and wishes of the American people in November. Senators who are coming up for reelection this year are running upon that platform. Representatives in Congress seeking reelection are running upon that platform. We have nominated a candidate for President and Vice President on that platform. We are going before the people on that platform. You have nominated your candidate for President and your candidate for Vice President on a different platform. No one understands what you mean on the prohibition question. It is ambiguous. It is as clear as mud. No one can explain it. You are going before the country on that proposition. The American people will have a clear-cut issue presented to them.

If the people of New Jersey want Mr. Hoover, and want the Vice President, and want your weak, milky, muddy prohibition plank on repeal, then they will vote for your Republican ticket. If they want to repeal the eighteenth amendment—and you say they do, although you have had a lot of fights within the Republican Party on that proposition; a lot of them in your party do not believe as you do on it—then they will have an opportunity to vote whether or not they want straight repeal.

As I look into the cunning eyes of my friend from New Jersey I want to give him a piece of advice. He does not come up for reelection this year; but if he wants to have a ghost of a chance of coming back, he had better not play ping-pong with the people of New Jersey on this issue. He had better tell them that he does not know what Hoover's views are; that he does not know what the Vice President's views are; that he only knows his own views; that the Republican Party has not been right on this question; that it has tried to play both ends against the middle; that he does not know what their platform means, it is so ambiguous. Talk like the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. He is not here now. Somebody probably told him I was going to talk on this subject and he left. He did not want to hear a real good speech on the eighteenth amendment. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. No demonstrations in the galleries are permitted.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will just make the same kind of a speech as the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] made to the Republican Convention, when he told them practically that they were a gang of hypocrites out there, and that the country would not accept that kind of plank, and that they ought to repudiate it, the Senator may get away with it up in New Jersey; but he will not if he takes the kind of a cue that he is following.

One thing, too, can be said about delegates to the Republican and the Democratic conventions. They knew what they were about. Of course it took a great deal of haltering on some of the delegates to keep them in line all the time.

Mr. KEAN rose.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator asks me a question, since I do not want to be taken off the floor——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield to the Senator after I tell him this incident.

Of course I do not blame delegates and Republicans generally for not knowing what to do, because the President does not know what he is doing half the time. The Republican delegates from Mississippi clearly indicated the Republican frame of mind when they had this plank on prohibition up in the convention. The negro delegates from Mississippi, who headed the delegation, never had any influence with this administration. As soon as this crowd up here got in, they turned out the negro delegates and the negro citizens down there were denied entree to the White House.

Mr. LONG. They did that in my State, too.

Mr. HARRISON. They did it in practically all the Southern States. They put in other patronage fellows to control the post offices, some very nice gentlemen, and they have been in control for four years; but when they got out to the Chicago convention, of course, the administration did not have any more use for these white gentlemen. They had some very smart negro delegates there, and of course they had a good influence in the North in certain sections among certain people; so in a contest there before the credentials committee they seated this delegation from Mississippi, and when the prohibition question came up they did not know for a while exactly how they were going to vote.

The instructions went from Perry Howard, the high "muckety-muck" of the negro delegation from Mississippi, who is one of the real and influential negro orators of this country, and there is none better. He left word, since he had to go to make a Republican speech, to vote "aye" on the adoption of the platform, and there was but about one delegate left in the Mississippi delegation, it is said, and he happened to be a negro, too. It was his first experience in a convention, and when the minority plank was presented first, he voted "aye," following the command of his chief. This substitute did not know the difference between a dry and wet plank. Of course, my friend from New Jersey would know better. But as to where the President stands on this question, he has no more conviction than the Republican delegate from Mississippi, and he will probably remain about as quiet, for fear he will make a mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. In just a moment I will yield.

That is the way with a good many of our Republican friends, whether it is in the Republican convention or elsewhere. We know what we are about. We were clear cut and direct in what we said our plank would be. We knew, when we adopted it, what we were doing. We expect to go before the country on that proposition, and we are going to live up to it. If we are intrusted with power by the people from New Jersey, and by the citizens of this country, after the 4th of March, we will live up to the platform, and we will pass a resolution repealing the eighteenth amendment.

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I wanted to ask the Senator, just before he left the point about the care that is given to the negro delegates from Mississippi and other Southern States, inasmuch as we know that after they get through with them in the convention, that ends their political participation, if they are not in the position usually down our way of being permitted to receive sacrament and vote for the preacher in Republican politics, and that about ends the matter.

Mr. HARRISON. That is right. As soon as the election is over our colored friends down there will be thrown out and the white bunch will be put back in. But they will use them effectively in the campaign.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KEAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he is aware of the fact that all the Republicans in the House from New Jersey asked the candidate for Vice President of the Democratic Party whether they could not amend the Volstead Act now, and he refused to allow them to do so? How does the Senator from Mississippi explain that?

Mr. HARRISON. That demonstrated that our vice presidential candidate has political sense. Does the Senator think we are so foolish, that we know so little about politics, as to pass a beer proposition here at this session of Congress? Does the Senator think that if there is any advantage to come from the modification of the Volstead law, within constitutional limitations, in the coming election, we are going to give it all away by voting for modification at this time? We are not violating any pledge by taking that course. It takes a good long time to pass a constitutional amendment.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will wait a moment. It takes some time to do that. It took a long time for the suffrage amendment to be adopted by the various States of the Union and by the Congress, and the same was true with reference to the eighteenth amendment. So, if the resolution for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment is proposed by the Congress in March, I dare say it will take some months—indeed, it may take a year or more, or several years—before the requisite number of conventions of the States shall have adopted the proposition. In the meantime, in the interim, before the eighteenth amendment shall have been repealed, we pledge ourselves, in this plank of the Democratic platform—and we expect to go before the country on that proposition during this campaign—that on the 4th day of March, or as soon thereafter as possible, we will modify the Volstead law within constitutional limitations so as to permit beer to be sold. Does that answer the Senator's question? I know it is disappointing to him.

Mr. KEAN. No, Mr. President; it does not answer my question because the Senator from Mississippi says on the 4th day of March and the platform says "immediately."

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the platform says "immediately."

Mr. KEAN. Therefore the Senator repudiates the Democratic platform.

Mr. HARRISON. "Immediately!" That plank was not adopted for the guidance of Congress at this session at all. That platform was adopted for candidates for the Senate and the presidential and vice presidential candidates to run on. But the Senator complains. Well, his platform says nothing. It is perfectly silent on modification. What are you going to do; take yours, with nothing in it, or ours. with a definite promise? In the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who introduced the substitute amendment, and who championed it, and who made a most forceful speech for it, in presenting it to the committee on resolutions and in the Democratic convention, he expressly stated that during the interim, after we have passed through the campaign, we will take the action which I have suggested.

No one ever dreamed that the question would come up in this session of Congress, and from a Democratic standpoint it would be a foolish thing for us to try to take action now. Let those who want to modify, whether it be in Connecticut, or up in Rhode Island, or in New Jersey, those who want the Volstead law modified, vote the Democratic ticket, vote for the platform that insures that; and after the 4th of March, if they will give us enough votes here, we will put it over for them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi, whose very clear exposition was aided by the questions propounded by the Senator from New Jersey and the replies made by the Senator from Mississippi, if it be not true that, if the amendment, so called, tendered by the Senator from Connecticut under the guise or name of a modification of the Volstead Act, had met with success in humiliating the President of the United States and defeating the object of the home loan bill, and had been added to the home loan bank bill and sent to the House, would not the House have had a home loan bank bill and no beer bill whatever before it? The public has not understood that.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Before the Senator from New Jersey leaves the floor, with the permission of the Presiding Officer, I would like to ask him a question. The Senator says he is for the modification of the Volstead law so as to permit the sale of beer, and he wants it done right now. Does the Senator think that his President would sign a bill if it were passed now, or at any time, carrying out that idea?

Mr. KEAN. I hope so, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator hopes so. He does not know, though, does he?

Mr. KEAN. I have no secret information of anything the President is thinking about.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator believe he would?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator believes he would sign it?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is a living curiosity of Republican optimism. [Laughter.]

CROP CULTIVATION LOANS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House, and agree to the same.

PETER NORBECK,
FREDERICK STEIWER,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY B. STEAGALL,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
ANNING S. PRALL,
L. T. MCFADDEN,
JAMES G. STRONG,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate agree to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will not the Senator make an explanation?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senate passed a bill, Mr. President, in connection with the loans for production of crops under certain conditions for the year 1932. The House amended the bill so as to include in the 1932 extension, under the conditions named in the measure, dairy products.

The Senate disagreed and asked for a conference, and the conferees upon the part of the House and the Senate met; the House conferees insisted upon their amendment, the Senate conferees receded, and the House has adopted the conference report. I am therefore moving that the Senate agree to the report. It means no new appropriation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether this involves the $10,000,000 appropriation heretofore made?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it has nothing to do with that. It makes no new appropriation.

Mr. KING. What was the original fund appropriated?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it was $200,000,000.

Mr. KING. From the Reconstruction Finance Corporation fund?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, as I understand it, the effect of the conference report is to extend throughout the present year the operations of the agricultural production loan. Is that correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct; so as to include cultivation.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not extend it over until next year?

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very much pleased with the report and hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to debate the conference report?

Mr. BLAINE. Is it debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is debatable.

The conference report was agreed to.

MERGER OF STREET-RAILWAY CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, these was some confusion in the Senate following the statement of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] in withdrawing his motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the street-car merger measure. It was my desire at that time to rise and approve the withdrawal of that motion. I was not recognized, through no fault of the Chair, and therefore I desire at this time to express my approval of the Senator from Vermont in withdrawing the motion to take up the so-called merger bill.

It has been very obvious to everyone that deliberate consideration could not be given this very important measure during the closing days of the session.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to make my statement. I have waited over an hour for the opportunity.

It has been apparent to everyone that during the last three days there has been a great deal of political discussion introduced in the debate. I am not objecting to that. I make no complaint about it. That is perfectly natural. It was bound to be so. I realized when the motion to proceed to the consideration of the merger bill was first made that the Senate would be in no mental or temperamental condition to give the bill earnest and serious consideration.

The Senate has now been in session for over eight months continuously, engaged in the consideration of important legislation. The measure is of such great importance to the people of the District of Columbia that it ought not to be taken up in the last two or three days of the session under the conditions that have existed. It is a measure that should require and does require the conscientious consideration of the Congress at a time when the Congress could give it due and proper consideration.

The merger bill, so called, is not a complete unification bill. It still leaves the utility companies within the District in a scrambled condition. The bill that is pending also authorizes a system of subsidiary companies, which means that in the future, and we do not know how near that future may be, the Congress will be again confronted with a merger proposal to unscramble the various subsidiaries that are authorized to be created under the bill.

There are some other interests outside of the traction interests which should be considered in connection with this matter. There are more than half a million people in the District of Columbia who have no representation in the Congress. They must rely upon the Members of Congress and by petition submit their views, their demands, their rights. Under the merger bill as proposed practically the only benefit that would come to the street-car users in the District of Columbia, as shown by the testimony, would be a saving of about $60,000 in transfers, but the traction companies would escape not less than $250,000, though estimated by some to run as high at $400,000, of a charge that is now made against the traction companies and which expenditure, when the traction companies are released therefrom, will be fastened upon the taxpayers of the District. Therefore, from the financial standpoint of the people of the District, they would be the losers financially under the proposed merger bill.

Moreover, it has been the desire of those who have been laboring for years in connection with the matter to bring about a complete unification. There is no objection to a unification measure, but there is objection on the part of the people of the District to setting up a system whereby the North American Co., a foreign company, shall obtain control of both street-railway systems and of the Potomac Electric Power Co., the company which produces the electric energy not only for the street cars but as well for the private users of electricity in the District. The bill as it is drafted would make the North American Co. a holding company for the new company and for the Potomac Electric Power Co. It would also make the North American Co. the holder of such subsidiary companies as are authorized under the proposed bill. Therefore, instead of having a unification bill we have a bill which scrambles the situation more than it is to-day. It has been the desire of those who have been urging unification in the interest of the people of the District to unscramble the entire situation, to bring about a complete unification, and thus bring to the people of the District reduced street-car fares and reduced rates for electric power and light.

I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits in any great detail. I have merely called attention to the importance of the measure. I also want to call attention to another very important feature of the bill. The bill as reported by the House provides only for universal transfers between street cars, but it gives to the new street-railway company that is to be organized and to the bus company a complete monopoly of the streets in the District of Columbia. Those of us who have undertaken to speak for the people of the District believe that we should follow the rule that where there is a monopoly granted for the use of the streets for a particular purpose, namely, for transportation by bus and street car, there shall be universal free transfers. Some of us who have been undertaking to bring about a unification believe that there ought to be an opportunity to consider the bill when the Senate has sufficient time and not in the closing days of the session which are occupied to a large extent, as the time has been occupied, by political speeches.

In view of the situation which I have described I think it was the part of wisdom, it was good sense, for the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to refrain from pressing his motion in the closing days of the session. For one, and I think I can speak as well for the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. CAPPER, I believe that this matter ought to be taken up at such time as it can be fully considered, when the amendments which will be offered may be properly and fully explained, with a single object in view, namely, the complete unification of the transportation systems in the District of Columbia, including the Potomac Electric Power Co., protection to the people of the District respecting rates, and a complete unscrambling of present conditions. If we were to pass the merger bill as it has been reported to us, we would then be inviting additional extensions of street-railway service under subsidiaries without any limitation on the number of those subsidiaries.

So, Mr. President, I close by commending the very able junior Senator from Vermont in withdrawing his motion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to take the time of the Senate to read a short editorial which applies to the street-railway situation. I want to take occasion to commend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] for their minority report in this matter. I read from an editorial appearing in the Washington News of April 30, 1932, entitled "The Figures' Lesson," as follows:

Quarterly reports on their earnings are being filed with the Public Utilities Commission by the corporation it regulates. In the beginning of the third year of the depression the Potomac Electric Power Co. reports net income for the quarter of $1,256,264, or at the rate of $5,000,000 annual profit.

Pepco's figures show a continuation of the annual increase of profit which has occurred now for several years. But the most interesting thing is that the street-car company which owns it, the Washington Railway & Electic Co., reports for the same quarter an almost identical decrease of profits. Pepco gained $38,615 in net income for the quarter. Wreco lost $38,847 in net income for the same quarter.

The power company has reduced rates annually and its profit has grown. The car company has increased rates and its profits have dwindled. And yet street-car executives can not read the lesson.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAYS TREATY

Mr. BORAH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 278), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation and to hold hearings with respect to matters touching the St. Lawrence waterways treaty between the United States and Canada. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. BORAH subsequently, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the foregoing resolution was referred, reported it without amendment, and it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND subsequently said: Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate Resolution 278, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in the second paragraph of the resolution, after the words "which shall not exceed," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation and to hold hearings with respect to matters touching the St. Lawrence waterways treaty between the United States and Canada. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE COLUMBIA AND SNAKE RIVERS—HEARINGS

Mr. TOWNSEND. Out of order, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably Senate Resolution 256 and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 256) submitted by Mr. MCNARY, Mr. STEIWER, and Mr. THOMAS of Idaho on June 28, 1932, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings during the recess between the first and second sessions of the Seventy-second Congress, at such times and places as it deems advisable, on the bills S. 4408, to provide for the construction of work for the development of the Columbia River and minor tributaries, and for other purposes; and S. 2670, to provide for the improvement of the Columbia and Snake Rivers, Seventy-second Congress.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ such stenographic assistance as it deems advisable, but the cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses incurred pursuant to this resolution, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is not asking for immediate consideration of the resolution, is he?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for immediate consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Delaware or whoever offered the resolution to advise me in regard to the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the resolution was submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], my colleague the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and myself. It provides for hearings on bills affecting the Columbia and Snake Rivers in connection with the development of power and the selection of sites, surveys recently having been made. The idea is to have the Committee on Reclamation and Irrigation, having jurisdiction, to hold hearings by subcommittee along the river and to report back to Congress whether there are feasible sites.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think it wise legislation?

Mr. McNARY. I do. The amount carried by the resolution has been reduced from the original sum of $2,500 to $1,500.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object, but I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President of the United States suggested some time ago—I think when he was running for the Presidency—a large appropriation of some $500,000,000 for the development of the Columbia River. It looks as though we are embarking upon a plan to spend billions of dollars for development work—the St. Lawrence, the Columbia, and other rivers—when many of the projects ought to be carried forward by private capital instead of by the Federal Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution. The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

WHEAT AND COTTON FOR THE RED CROSS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK (reading):

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 461) making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement with reference to the joint resolution. It has been passed by the House, and proposes to appropriate money to carry out the terms of a Senate joint resolution which was passed and signed by the President on the 5th day of July. Briefly, the joint resolution which was passed directed the Federal Farm Board to turn over to the Red Cross 45,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton. The joint resolution for which I am now asking consideration is designed to carry out the provisions of the previous joint resolution by making the necessary appropriation. That is all there is to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move in line——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution has not been agreed to. The question is on that motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make an observation in regard to this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has just stated that the purpose of the joint resolution which he has asked the Senate to consider is to carry out what he assumes to be a pledge upon the part of the Congress, or at least on the part of the Senate, to appropriate a large sum of money.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it is to carry out the provisions of a joint resolution which has been passed by the Congress. It is to carry out the action not just by the Senate but of Congress as provided in a joint resolution signed by the President and now a law.

Mr. KING. I assumed that the Senator meant the joint resolution which was passed constituted a pledge on the part of the Congress to supplement it by an adequate appropriation in order that it might be carried into effect.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I do not consider it exactly as a pledge, so far as that is concerned, but the Congress contemplated our doing that. This joint resolution was reported to the House by the Appropriations Committee of the House, and was passed by the House. It proposes to carry out the provisions of the joint resolution which was recently enacted. Congress was convinced that we ought to furnish the Red Cross with 45,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton in these difficult times.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I believe that a majority of the Members of the Senate, and I think possibly a majority of the Members of the House, when they voted for the original joint resolution, which is the basis for the one now under consideration, understood that there was to be turned over by the Farm Board to the Red Cross substantially 50,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton without cost to the Government; that is to say, without an appropriation being called for to be made now out of the Treasury of the United States. It was assumed—at least, that was my information—that wheat and cotton were available for distribution, or sale, as might be determined, by the Farm Board, if Congress itself should not superimpose itself upon the Farm Board and determine the policy which it should pursue with respect to the commodities referred to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The original joint resolution came from another committee; it did not come from the Appropriations Committee. The other committee evidently knew about conditions affecting the wheat and cotton, because there were really three conditions imposed by that joint resolution that must be taken care of.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend it is possible, and quite likely, the committee that carried on the investigation may have understood the facts, but I do not believe that a majority of the Members of the Senate understood, and, speaking for myself, I certainly did not understand that there were liens upon these two commodities of approximately $40,000,000, and that we were to be asked to appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States forty or fifty million dollars in order to free the commodities that were to be distributed from the liens thus existing.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not remember about any extensive discussion, but I know in the original joint resolution there was an express provision that certain charges would have to be met out of the price that might come to the Government from the wheat which was held, and that can not be gotten until these charges have been paid. I am satisfied that Congress understood the situation and understood what it was doing when it took this action. I am not going to occupy further time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I must express dissent from the position just taken by my friend from Washington. I did not understand, and I make the assertion again that I do not think the majority of the Members of the Senate understood, that we were to be called upon further to deplete the Treasury of the United States by taking from it $50,000,000 in order to pay the debts that had been contracted by the Farm Board, notwithstanding the fact that they had gotten $500,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States.

HOME-LOAN BANKS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me? I desire to present a conference report to which I think there will be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. KING. I yield for that purpose, with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report presented by the Senator from South Dakota is privileged and the Senator from Utah will not lose the floor.

Mr. NORBECK. I present a conference report on House bill 12280 and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 21, 24, 25, 27, 35, 38, 39, 40, and 42.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 8, 14, 16, 19, 20, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 34, 36, 37, 43, and 44, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "insurance company, or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert a comma and the following: "or, in case there is a lawful contract rate of interest applicable to such transactions, in excess of such rate (regardless of any exemption from usury laws), or, in case there is no legal rate of interest or lawful contract rate of interest applicable to such transactions, in excess of 8 per cent per annum and a comma"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That accumulated dividends, as provided in subsection (k), have been paid"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "but in any case in which the rate of dividend is in excess of 2 per cent, the stock subscribed for by the United States shall be entitled to dividends at a rate not in excess of that paid on other stock"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 32: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "its advances" and a comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following: "The notes, debentures, and bonds issued by any bank, with unearned coupons attached, shall be accepted at par by such bank in payment of or as a credit against the obligation of any home-owner debtor of such bank"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "$300,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert a comma and the following: "except a national bank, trust company, or other banking organization" and a comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 46 and 47.

PETER NORBECK,
JAMES E. WATSON,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY B. STEAGALL,
W. F. STEVENSON,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
L. T. MCFADDEN,
ROBERT LUCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NORBECK. I move the adoption of the conference report. If that be done, I shall move that the Senate insist on its amendments in disagreement, ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, and the motion is debatable.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Dakota what are amendments 46 and 47?

Mr. NORBECK. Amendment numbered 46 is the so-called Borah amendment, and amendment numbered 47 is a minor amendment, the last one on the page; I have forgotten for the moment just what it is. There is another one as to the meaning of which there seems to be a misunderstanding. Therefore, I desire to move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments.

Mr. COUZENS. If we shall agree to the conference report, will that mean that all the differences are settled with the exception of amendments numbered 46 and 47?

Mr. NORBECK. No; I would not say that; but they would be settled except for those and one other.

Mr. COUZENS. Those and one other. I should like to know what the other is.

Mr. NORBECK. The other has reference to the rate of interest that may be charged. It is the so-called usury amendment. It does not seem to be in good form; there seems to have been a mistake in writing it. So it should go back to conference for that reason.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand if we agree to the motion of the Senator from South Dakota that we accept the action of the House and Senate conferees with the exceptions indicated?

Mr. NORBECK. No; the motion is not in that way. The motion is that we disagree. I will say, for the information of the Senator from Michigan, that the conferees have reached an understanding; and I know what they will do except on these three amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the first question is upon the motion to agree to the conference report. Then the motion of the Senator from South Dakota that the Senate further insist upon its amendments will be in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield; and may I also have the attention of the assistant leader on the other side, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]? Is it intended to take a recess until to-morrow morning?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this matter should be disposed of, I assume, first. I do not know how long the Senator from Washington wants to go on with his measure. It is a little bit too early to promise right at this time.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will yield further, the point I had in mind was this:

There are a large number of amendments which have been suggested by the conferees, or at least are the result of the conference, with many of which, speaking for myself, I am not familiar. I am quite sure that many of the Senators are not familiar with them. If the matter has to go back to conference, it seems to me that there should be no haste in our agreeing upon the report as submitted.

It occurs to me that if the report as submitted could be printed, and the conferees could continue their activities and try to reach an agreement upon the two or three or four controversial matters, we could to-morrow morning, in one bite of the cherry—if I may use the language of the street—dispose of the entire question; and we certainly could do so, speaking for myself, in a very short time.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the Senator knows how many Senators are going to read the report to-morrow morning. In other words, Senators are in no frame of mind to go into the matter any further. This subject has been before the Senate for months and months. The Senators are pretty familiar with it, and I do not think many Senators will pay any attention to the printed report just now.

Mr. KING. I understand that a number of very important changes have been made. First, I understand that there have been revived in the bill some of the provisions that were in the original bill, namely, the 12 banks or at least 8 regional banks, striking out the provision for 4 banks which appeared in the bill as it finally passed the Senate.

Mr. NORBECK. The other conferees, I think, will bear me out in the statement—I am quite sure I am right—that the bill simply provides for four banks, but makes it possible to establish more. It does not start out with a large number of banks, as the original bill did. The appropriation proposed in the original bill was $500,000, and in this one it is $300,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator from Florida can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I say to the Senator, in reference to the matter of printing, that the bill has been printed showing all the amendments that were put on in the Senate. The bill has been printed, and the amendments themselves have been set out; so that I do not think we need to have any reprint.

Mr. KING. I do not ask for a reprint, but so that we can have an opportunity of understanding just what the conferees have done. As I listened to the reading of the report just now, it indicated that a large number of amendments had been made, that the Senate had receded from a large number of amendments, and that a large number of provisions had been agreed upon by the conferees as attachments to the House provisions or to the Senate provisions. One could not tell, from reading the report, whether the bill had been transformed or changed in its essential parts, or whether they were mere minor amendments which had been agreed upon.

I do not like to vote for this conference report in the dark; and if the Senator insists upon a vote now, I shall, of course, have to vote against the conference report, although if I understood it, or if proper explanations were made, with opportunity to examine the numerous changes which have been made, I might be very glad to accept the report.

Mr. NORBECK. Let me say to the Senator that I feel that the motion really should be to disagree to the conference report, and send it back to conference. If that is what the Senator from Utah wants we will accommodate him, and I will make the motion in that way.

Mr. KING. I have not said that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the Senator from South Dakota has now changed his motion?

Mr. NORBECK. No. It may be subject to a different interpretation, but this is the motion I was going to make——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question would be on agreeing to the report; but, of course, if Senators are opposed to it, the motion could be voted down.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, if the report is rejected, all the matters that were previously in conference will be in conference now. Is that right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. NORBECK. All right.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will move to disagree to the report, and send the bill back.

Mr. NORBECK. I make the motion in that way.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the simple thing is to agree to what has already emerged from the conferees, and then to send the disputed items back to another conference.

Mr. COUZENS. That is just what I do not want.

Mr. NORBECK. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there is an error in the report that should be corrected, and I know of no other way to keep the matter within the jurisdiction of the conference committee than to reject the report.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, as I understand, the motion of the Senator from South Dakota is that the entire report be disagreed to and sent back to conference. If that is the motion, I shall not object; but if the Senator's motion is to agree upon the report as made, with the exceptions, then I shall desire to discuss it for some time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the proper way to put the question is to submit the motion to agree to the conference report. That, of course, could be voted down if the chairman of the committee desires, or if a majority of the Senate feels the same way.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. COUZENS obtained the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not in order to move to disagree?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the rules it is stated that a motion to amend an amendment may be made before the motion to agree or disagree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not an amendment. This is a conference report, which must be voted up or voted down.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was referring to the phase in the rules, which uses the word "disagree."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the conference report be adopted or rejected? The question raised by the Senator from Connecticut applies to amendments. This, however, is a full report.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. COUZENS rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that the chairman of the committee asks that the report be rejected, so there is no need to discuss it.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator from South Dakota will ask that the report be rejected and sent back to conference, I will not take any of the Senate's time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has asked that that be done.

Mr. NORBECK. That is my request; and we can bring that about by voting "no" when the question is put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was rejected.

Mr. NORBECK. I ask that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the House bill and request a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NORBECK, Mr. WATSON, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference with the House.

MOTION TO DISCHARGE A COMMITTEE

Mr. BULKLEY submitted a motion, which was read, as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule 40 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice of my intention to move hereafter to suspend paragraph 2 of rule 26 of the Standing Rules for the purpose of making in order the following motions:

A motion to proceed to the consideration of the motion heretofore entered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States repealing the eighteenth amendment thereto.

A motion, in the event the prior motion is agreed to, to proceed immediately to the consideration of the said joint resolution.

WHEAT AND COTTON FOR AMERICAN RED CROSS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 461, making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that we might have the question put on the question of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I understand that the Senator will probably take only 10 minutes or so to-morrow morning.

Mr. KING. A very short time; not exceeding a half hour.

Mr. JONES. If that will save time, I will agree to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Federal Farm Board to carry into effect the provisions of the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress," approved July 5, 1932, such sums as may be necessary during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used only for the purposes specified in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 3 of such public resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order to perfect the joint resolution, I move, on page 1, line 8, after the numerals "1932," to strike out "such sums as may be necessary during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, are" and to insert "not to exceed $40,000,000 is."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, lines 8 and 9, it is proposed to strike out "such sums as may be necessary during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, are" and to insert "not to exceed $40,000,000 is."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while I much prefer that the amendment be not put on, under the circumstances, as I understand there will be very determined opposition unless we reach some conclusion like that, and it is very important that this measure should be gotten through just as soon as possible, I will not insist upon the objection.

Mr. KING. That does not preclude offering a substitute after it is perfected?

Mr. JONES. Certainly not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "(b)."

Mr. JONES. I make the same statement with reference to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now I offer a third amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, at the end of line 3, after the word "resolution" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That the equity provided for under subdivision (b) of the public resolution approved July 5, 1932, shall not be paid for out of said appropriation, and any balance remaining after paying the amounts authorized to be paid under subdivisions (a) and (c) of said resolution shall not be used by the Federal Farm Board, but shall remain in the Treasury of the United States: And provided further, That the Federal Farm Board shall make a full and complete accounting of its acts and doings under this resolution and file the same with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before December 8, 1932.

Mr. JONES. I make the statement with reference to that amendment. I should much prefer that it be not adopted; but, under the circumstances, I will not resist it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator to advise me if I am in error that this amendment means that the Farm Board will get no part of this $40,000,000; that whatever is required to pay the liens upon the cotton and upon the wheat will be taken from the $40,000,000, and if there is any residue it shall go into the Treasury, and not go into the pockets of the Farm Board to be squandered and wasted by it as it has squandered and wasted so much of the $500,000,000 heretofore appropriated to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator has stated the matter with accuracy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer a substitute, which I ask to have lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. KING to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 461) making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress, viz: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That to enable the Federal Farm Board to carry into effect the provisions of the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress," approved July 5, 1932, such sums as may be necessary during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used only for (1) meeting carrying and handling charges and interest payment on commercial or intermediate credit bank loans on or against 30,000,000 bushels of wheat and 400,000 bales of cotton released for donation under the provisions of such public resolution between the date of its approval and the delivery of the wheat or cotton to the American National Red Cross or other organization, and (2) making advances under subdivision (a) of section 3 of such public resolution with respect to such wheat and cotton released: Provided, That the total amount expended pursuant to this resolution shall not exceed $30,000,000.

"SEC. 2. (a) The Federal Farm Board shall be composed of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and of the Secretary of Agriculture, ex officio. Such appointments shall be made as soon as practicable after the date of the enactment of this resolution, but not later than October 1, 1932.

"(b) Terms of office of the first members appointed under this section shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, one at the end of one year, one at the end of two years, and one at the end of three years after the date of enactment of this resolution. The term of office of a successor to any such member shall expire three years from the time of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that a member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. The members appointed hereunder shall hold office until their successors are appointed and qualify.

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) the Federal Farm Board as constituted upon the date of the enactment of this resolution shall continue to function until all of the members appointed as provided in such subsection have taken office and no such member shall be paid a salary, as such member, for any period prior to such time.

"(d) This section shall be held to reorganize the board and, except as herein modified, all laws relating to such board shall remain in full force and effect, and no regulations, actions, investigations, or other proceedings under any such laws existing or pending on the date of the enactment of this resolution shall abate or otherwise be affected by reason of the provisions of this section."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I stated a while ago, the Senator from Utah assures me that he wants to take just a short time in the morning, not over half an hour, and then we will have a vote on the amendment. So I am perfectly willing that the joint resolution shall go over until tomorrow morning.

PURCHASES OF TWINE BY THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to make just a short statement.

Yesterday the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] stated that after reading a letter from the Postmaster General to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he was satisfied that the Postmaster General was correct in the construction placed by the department upon the section in the post-office appropriation bill providing that preference be given to domestically produced commodities. At that time I stated that the Senator from Pennsylvania had not objected to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations. Upon looking at the record I find that the Postmaster General was correct in stating that the Senator from Pennsylvania had made such objection, and, in justice to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Postmaster General, I wanted to make this statement.

CONSERVATION

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it was my favor a few days ago—on June 25—to attend a meeting at the Cosmos Club in this city attended by many interested in conservation. At the meeting addresses were made by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the majority leader in the House of Representatives, Representative RAINEY, of Illinois, and others. The addresses, containing material of historical value and significance, have not been printed in any newspaper or magazine. They are nonpartisan and nonpolitical in character. I ask unanimous consent that the remarks made at that time be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. BASIL MANLY, TOASTMASTER

Ladies and gentlemen, we who are friends of Harry Slattery have met here this evening for the rather unique purpose of honoring a man who has never sought or held public office and who has avoided publicity, as far as it was possible for him to do so, throughout his career.

I am not quite sure why I was chosen to act as director of ceremonies, except perhaps because of the fact that I have known Harry Slattery longer than anyone else here and longer than almost anyone else living; but I like him and love him just the same.

I might reveal a heretofore unrevealed secret, that Harry and I were born just across the street from each other in the little town of Greenville, S. C. One of my earliest memories of Harry is playing cards with him in Grady Jordan's barn. We were raised in a very pious atmosphere, and it was necessary to go up in the loft of the barn to pursue such pastimes.

It was 25 years ago when Harry came to Washington and began taking part in the affairs of Washington and the affairs of the Nation. That was during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt. The forests of the country at that time were about to become the prey of the great lumber interests. The conservation movement developed during that period and gained the impetus which has carried it on ever since. Even at that early date Harry was an important factor in that movement, and he has become an increasingly important factor during the succeeding years.

The Taft administration brought a continuation of the struggle over the Nation's natural resources. The Ballinger case and the great fight to withdraw the naval oil reserves from further exploitation developed, and in that struggle likewise Harry played his part.

The Wilson administration came into office March 4, 1913. This, I believe, is not generally known, but one of the most important episodes of that period, which made possible some of the achievements of the first part of the Wilson administration, was the exposure of the lobbies which were then operating in Washington. The President made public a statement in which those lobbyists were denounced. He was called upon to furnish specifications and was not in a position to do so immediately. But a man came to his rescue—a very young man at that time—and put into his hands the basic information which resulted in uncovering the lobby of the National Association of Manufacturers and a host of other lobbies which were operating at that time. That young man was Harry Slattery.

Without going into all of the details down through the years, but touching upon some of the high spots of which I have personal knowledge, I want to speak particularly of the fight that resulted in saving the naval oil reserves and in exposing those who had succeeded in taking them from the Government.

The first public attack upon the naval oil leases was made by Harry Slattery at a dinner very much like this held in the Ebbitt Hotel on March 10, 1922. Following that came official exposure on the floor of the Senate, about which something may be said later in the evening.

And so it went down through all these years. Mr. Slattery has been the real protector, the real watchdog of the public domain, of the natural power resources, and of our human resources. I think we might well rise and drink a toast to Harry Slattery.

Whereupon the assembly rose and drank a toast to Mr. Slattery.

There is a Biblical quotation that "He who is greatest among you, let him be the servant of all." That has been the practice of one of the great men who is with us this evening, a man who has insisted upon taking a place at the foot of the table. He can not completely hide himself from us, because I am going to call upon him to respond to the toast, "The preservation of our natural resources," Senator NORRIS. [Great applause.]

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS, SENATOR FROM NEBRASKA

Senator NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that one could respond to the toast that the chairman has propounded to me and do it properly without somewhere paying tribute to Harry Slattery.

All of those who have been connected with the preservation of the natural resources of the United States during the last several years, in various ways and various forms and on various occasions—if they have gone into a very thorough study and into the history of the great fight that has been waged for many years to preserve our God-given resources and keep them from exploitation—I say that any citizen who goes into that thoroughly will run into the tracks of Harry Slattery somewhere along the line.

There are men engaged in public service in which it is necessary to have some one with ability, with steadfastness, and with the purest of motives, and who has to do a great deal of work the public never sees. That work will find its place in the great book, upon the page whereon the names of those will be written who are behind such fights in behalf of the people, though the individual does not become generally known as doing the work among the people themselves. Such a man is Harry Slattery.

I was somewhat surprised that the chairman, in his narration, indicated that Harry was a comparatively young man. I came here when I was a young man, and Harry was an old man then. I figure that the only reason why the chairman made that unjust charge was because he had said that he and Harry were born about the same time.

We have almost forgotten the Ballinger investigation. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of it for years until I heard you mention it, but it was a wonderful contest; it was a battle for a principle that ought to be sacred to every lover of human liberty and everyone who is anxious to retain the foundation stones on which our Government is built; and Harry Slattery had a great deal to do with it.

I do not suppose that there is a person present who knows, either, that I had anything to do with it; but it is as straight in my mind as though it happened to-night, although I had not thought of it for a long time. The Ballinger work had become so well known that it was really a stench in the nostrils of the people, and an investigation was demanded, and it became apparent that it had to be made in response to the demands of the people, the indignant people of the country, who had become aroused at what was going on.

In those days the Senate and House were both controlled by machines that were riveted by a steel fence that was so tight that nobody thought there was any way to get through. And so this great political machine, realizing that the people were becoming indignant and that something had to be done, decided that they would investigate the Ballinger matter and, of course, there would be a whitewash. The concurrent resolution was introduced, providing for the appointment of a commission to make this investigation, and they appointed a large commission. There were 10 men to be on the commission, 5 to be appointed by the President of the Senate and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. There used to be, in those days, as you all know—and still is—harmony on occasions when it is necessary between great political machines. Often there is not any difference between them; they drink out of the same canteen and they are supplied from the same source to get enough oil to keep the machine properly lubricated. It was that way then.

The Republicans, however, had a Vice President whose name was Sherman, of New York, and in the House of Representatives was Speaker Cannon, another man just like him. So this resolution passed the Senate. In those days, so complete was the control of the machine that the newspapermen announced in the morning what the House and Senate would do in the afternoon, and in the morning paper it was announced that this resolution, which had already passed the Senate, would come up in the House and that, immediately after the reading of the Journal, Judge Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, would introduce a special rule, which would provide for the passage of the resolution. Everybody knew it would happen just that way and all of us fellows who were Members of the House, realizing that the master had spoken, did not expect anything else to happen. True to the report, after reading the Journal, Mr. Dalzell arose in his place and introduced the report from the Committee on Rules, which as you know had then, and still has, special privileges, and it was taken up by agreement between Champ Clark, the Democratic leader, and Cannon, the Republican leader, and they agreed, by unanimous consent, to have general debate of three hours on a side, and that anyone who spoke had a right to make a motion to amend, and that all such motions should be voted on at the close of the debate.

Well, I did not know the details about Ballinger and all of this material which Harry Slattery had worked up, but I was satisfied there was something in it and I knew, as everybody else knew, that there was a job on hand to whitewash Ballinger. That was generally known and in the debate it was charged. The Democrats ranted up and down the aisle and told what a terrible thing this committee was going to do—that it was going to whitewash this man; but it did not occur to them that they had a chance to amend. In those days we had in the House of Representatives a well-organized body of insurgents. We used to meet every night and talk over what we were going to do the next day. When that agreement was made, it entered my mind that here might be a good opportunity to have a real investigation instead of a whitewash; and so I determined to make a speech. To speak, you had to get the consent of the leader to yield to you some time, and with me it was a pretty difficult task with Dalzell. But next on the Committee on Rules, the ranking Republican, was Mr. Smith, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, who was a very warm personal friend of mine; and immediately after the debate started, Mr. Dalzell went down to get his lunch and, of course, he had delegated the next man until he came back.

I went over and sat in the Cherokee strip on the Democratic side, and said to Smith, "How about getting some time?" and he said, "All right, George, I will give you some time," and said, "How much do you want?" "Two minutes," I said. He said, "When do you want it?" And I said, "I want it as soon as I can get it." I was afraid Dalzell would get through with his lunch and get back. He said, "There is a Democrat over there talking now, but he is about through, and I will give you some time as soon as he finishes."

I had not got back to my seat until Smith said, "I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska."

I was innocent of trying to accomplish anything great, but I just knew it was a job; I just knew it was a whitewash, and that the whitewash had all been mixed up and it was going to be nothing but a whitewash job. I did not use up my two minutes. All I said was that it was generally believed and generally understood that this committee was going to whitewash Ballinger, and that I was perfectly satisfied that if the Speaker appointed the committee it would whitewash Ballinger; and I said, "Therefore, I move to amend this resolution by striking out 'appointed by the Speaker' and insert in lieu thereof 'elected by the House,'" and immediately the cap went off of the jug and consternation reigned and everybody was excited.

During the balance of the debate, which lasted until 6 o'clock, there was a scurrying around and they were getting their forces together on that amendment, and with a solid Democratic front and a solid insurgent front we adopted the amendment, and that is why there was a real Ballinger investigation. [Applause.]

We had a meeting, I remember. The insurgents met that night down on Massachusetts Avenue to decide what action we could take about the election of that committee. We did not want to be hoggish, but we wanted to name one, and the Republican membership could name two, but we insisted that certain men's names should not be on that committee, and we mentioned those who were thought to be objectionable and asked the Democrats if they would stay with us on it, and if they would, we would carry the proposition through.

I will now say that I had the honor of having tendered to me the unanimous wish of that group of insurgents that I should be a member of that committee. In the first place, I did not know much about it; and in the next place, I did not want to see myself liable to the charge of having obtained personal gain out of it, and I declined it. We selected as chairman of that committee Judge Madison, of Kansas, one of the ablest and most steadfast men of his time. If he had lived, he would have been one of the leaders in American history. He was an able attorney.

The Democrats named two good men. The Republicans were confined in their selection to a small number, on account of the exceptions we had drawn; and because there was one man there who was really determined to make an investigation, there was not anybody else on the committee that dared hesitate, and the majority of that committee went forward as one, with one of the most complete and thorough investigations that ever was made.

A man who now adorns the Supreme Court bench, Justice Brandeis, was the attorney who conducted the investigation, and managed it from beginning to end; and there was another instance, my friends, of what our friend Harry Slattery had done. He had done valuable work.

You people have given him credit; but I presume the generation that has grown up since then does not have knowledge of it, and that they do not even have knowledge of the trick I played in it; but without such a man to back us up, without such a man to furnish evidence and information and documents, lots of times it would have been physically impossible for us to get results. Without such a man, those who have tried to fight the people's causes in the last 10 years—without such a man, I repeat, we would nearly always have failed. Yet I often think that, even in failing, we win success that we do not at the time appreciate.

After all, this contest that I have mentioned, the Teapot Dome contest, and most any other contest that we have had, involves one fundamental principle that is the same down to the bottom, even, with the same principle involved that has been involved since the dawn of civilization, and that is a battle between monopoly and entrenched wealth against the common people of the country.

So I think you do well in honoring our friend, Harry Slattery, for the invaluable assistance that he has given to all. [Applause.]

TOASTMASTER. One of those who has played a part in the protection of natural power resources, Representative PHILIP SWING, of California, was unable to be here, but he has sent a letter which I would like to read:

"I recognize the fine, unselfish public service that Harry Slattery has rendered the people in his private capacity without the compensation of either pay or glory.

"In his quiet and unassuming way he has made tremendous contributions to every important fight for the people that has had Washington as its battle ground.

"I am particularly appreciative of the splendid work he did in connection with Boulder Dam in organizing the National Boulder Dam Association and throwing into this great project the power and influence of the progressives in every part of the country.

"I trust that in his heart there is an abiding satisfaction of a good work well done, because, in the end, those who keep the faith seldom win any other reward."

The natural resources have been a battle ground since the beginning of this country; its forests, its preserves of oil and coal have been constantly attacked by those who wish to exploit them. There is one here who can speak of his own knowledge of the long fight to preserve the national oil reserves and to protect the forests from exploitation. I therefore offer the toast, "To the protection of our public domain," and ask Senator LA FOLLETTE to speak to us.

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Toastmaster, men and women who have come here to-night to honor Harry Slattery, I am one of the generation that has grown up recently; but I remember the Ballinger investigation. While that investigation was in progress, Justice Brandeis, who was at that time conducting the prosecution, used to come very often to our house, and in discussing the details of that case and its procedure from day to day in the committee there was no name more frequently mentioned than that of Harry Slattery. During the years that followed, whenever there was a question in Congress affecting the natural resources of the Nation, whether it be with relation to the forests or to the water power or to coal or to oil, there was no one to whom my father turned more frequently, when those contests arose, than to Harry Slattery.

Much has been said of Harry's modesty and retiring disposition, to which I subscribe; but I would not wish this record to carry the implication that Mr. Slattery is not persistent, nor that he has not that determination and that courage which go to make up a great character—a great leader. Harry, it is true, has been retiring; it is true that he has been modest in the sense of ever having his name mentioned in connection with the legislative battles which have been fought over this great broad question of conservation; but Harry has had that perseverance, that persistence, that courage, that ability to stand up and fight until the last man had gone down, which has made possible the successful struggle that has been waged through all these years.

Perhaps I know most about the fight over the naval oil reserves, and perhaps I may speak more from my own personal knowledge with reference to that great episode in our recent history. It was Harry Slattery who first called attention to the transfer of the naval oil reserves from the Navy Department to the Department of the Interior. It was he who first brought that transfer to the attention of my father. And in order that there may be on this record made here to-night a part of the written history of that period, I wish to read a letter which my father wrote to Admiral Griffin and to Josephus Daniels, dated April 19, 1922, in which he says:

"Mr. Harry Slattery, the gentleman who bears this letter, I believe you already know. I have the greatest confidence in him and have entrusted to him the investigation of the present situation for me. This has been necessary because I am completely tied down with work in connection with the tariff bill. I will regard it as a favor if you will talk as freely to Mr. Slattery as you would to me were I able to see you. I might say in closing that I do not intend to see these naval reserves despoiled for the benefit of private individuals and corporations without a vigorous protest being made upon the floor of the Senate."

It is a matter of history that as a result of that preliminary investigation my father introduced a resolution which called for an investigation by the Public Lands Committee of the naval oil leases, which finally resulted in their being restored to the public from whom they had been despoiled.

It was not, however, only by means of a private letter that he made acknowledgment to Harry Slattery. On the floor of the Senate on April 28, 1922, he had this to say:

"Harry A. Slattery, I know, has contributed in no small measure to the development of this case. For many years as secretary of the National Conservation Association, and later as a practicing attorney, Mr. Slattery has been a veritable watchdog of the Nation's resources. In every contest over these resources he has been on the people's side, ready to give his time without compensation and devote his knowledge of these questions to the public service. On more than one occasion during the long fight that has been made on this floor to protect the Nation's water power, its timber, its ores, and its oil from ruthless exploitation I have called for Mr. Slattery's assistance. I never found him wanting."

To-day we face probably the most complex problems which have ever presented themselves for solution in the history of this democracy. I, for one, draw courage from the fact that we have men like Harry Slattery to support us in making the efforts which we must make to meet and solve these questions, and while I know that the Senator from Nebraska made his reference to the age of Mr. Slattery as a facetious remark I wish to say that it is a matter of inspiration and encouragement to me to feel that Harry Slattery will be here fighting these battles for the next 25 years as he has fought them during the last 25 years. [Applause.]

I do not know any greater tribute that I could pay to him to-night than that which I have heard my father pay to him, and one which he reserved for few men, namely, that Harry Slattery is the kind of man he would like to go tiger hunting with in the dark—because you can always reach out and be sure he is there. [Applause.]

TOASTMASTER. Many of Mr. Slattery's friends who would delight to join with us are absent at the convention in Chicago. It was necessary to confine the speaking program to those who were certain to be in the city, but the occasion would not be complete without hearing a message from one who has known Mr. Slattery over the whole span of his career—Representative HENRY T. RAINEY, the majority leader of the House.

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY, REPRESENTATIVE FROM ILLINOIS, MAJORITY LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. RAINEY. I have been closely associated with Mr. Slattery for over a quarter of a century of time. Soon after I came to Congress, 30 years ago, I saw a private corporation organized in Hamilton, Ill., and Keokuk, Iowa, by unanimous consent awarded a franchise to dam the Mississippi River at Keokuk. I was a new Member then and did not realize what it was all about. At that time any corporation desiring permission to build a dam for water-power purposes, wherever there was a declivity in any river, succeeded in getting by unanimous consent a bill passed through the House and the Senate for that purpose.

Along about 1908 or 1909 I announced on the floor of the House that no more bills to grant franchises for this purpose would pass the House by unanimous consent. From that time on until the Wilson administration commenced I was on the floor always objecting to requests for unanimous consent and during this period of time I made many speeches on the floor, always using material furnished me by Mr. Slattery.

At any time I was permitted by him to call him over the telephone. Whenever I wanted to answer a speech on this subject he always responded with data and information, and if I needed it at once he brought it in person to me and had it delivered to me on the floor of the House. I made many enemies among Members during this period of time, but I was able to meet in debate all comers and I was able to do it because I had back of me always Mr. Slattery.

The statement I made on the floor of the House announcing that no more unanimous consent in these matters would be granted really commenced the fight against the rapidly developing Water Power Trust. During the second year of the Wilson administration the President sent for me. I met him in his private apartments and he told me of a great many organizations which were anxious to commence the development of river projects and complained that I was holding it up and he asked me what could be done about it. I went over the matter with the President and he agreed that I was right about it. He asked me if I would be willing to participate as a member of a committee which he might select to frame a water power bill. I agreed, and he appointed the committee. This committee met daily for a long period of time. As I remember it, we met for some weeks almost daily in Secretary Lane's office and the result was the water power bill which we prepared.

During all the period of our meetings I was in touch with Mr. Slattery, getting his advice and his suggestions. We drafted the bill and delivered it to the chairmen of the committees having jurisdiction of the subject matter in both the House and the Senate, and it was introduced. The bill as it finally passed the House and Senate was different in many respects from the bill we drafted and I have always thought the bill we drafted was a better bill.

Prior to the Wilson administration and to the drafting of the bill the debate grew particularly animated on the floor of the House on account of the fact that I made charges on the floor which a Member of Congress from Tennessee, now deceased, interpreted as reflecting upon him. I charged that one Member at least was receiving compensation from the Aluminum Trust of America for his services in obtaining these franchises. Finally, in order to settle the matter, Congress adjourned one morning until 10 o'clock the next morning and I was given one hour to prove my charges against the Tennessee Member and he was given one hour to disprove them. I succeeded in proving my charges. I showed that he received considerable sums of money from the Aluminum Co. of America, which he was compelled to admit, but he claimed that he lost it all afterwards on account of having signed as surety some note given by some representative of the Water Power Trust.

I know of no living man who has rendered more service—and more effective service—for the public interest in the fight against the Water Power Trust than Harry Slattery. He has at all times kept modestly in the background and no one but his most intimate friends know the extent of his services nor the value of them.

TOASTMASTER. I am sure that everyone will agree with me that an important factor in the public service are those engaged in newspaper work in Washington, for whom Harry Slattery has always served as an inspiration and inexhaustible source of facts. I offer a toast to the "Preservation of a free and effective press," and ask Mr. Gilson Gardner to respond to it.

MR. GILSON GARDNER

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, and men and women who are friends of Mr. Slattery, as a friend of almost each and every one of those present, I am appearing in this case rather in the capacity of a has-been and I may, therefore, perhaps be pardoned if I associate myself with Mr. Slattery to the extent of saying that I played a part, with Senator NORRIS, in the original Ballinger case.

Our organization, perhaps not through direct bribery and corruption, but by some means, secured a confession from the private secretary of Ballinger. This confession covered the preparation of a document by a distinguished official of several recent administrations, a document which pretended to be an opinion on the case, on which President Taft had presented judgment, and which, when he could not verify it, Louis Brandeis suspected was antedated. It was pursued until, finally, the secretary, Mr. Frederick M. Kirby, told us the truth about the preparation of that document down in the Interior Department. Mr. Kirby, two or three years later, was my private secretary; so you can see how I was intimately connected with the Ballinger case. Mr. Kirby became, when he got free from that influence, a very fine and very efficient newspaperman. He is still with the Scripps organization.

I never knew the end of the capacity of Mr. Slattery. He knows more now than most anybody. He has got more material in his files up there than anybody in the United States. If he ever prints the history of his life, the public will sit up and take a great deal of notice.

I am reminded by this tribute to Mr. Slattery, which has my utmost approval, of a story which I heard the other day: One of my classmates was a district attorney for the western end of Massachusetts for 13 years, and he tried the cases of all of the criminals in that part of the country. He was over in Boston one day and met one of the distinguished lights there. This man said to him: "And is it true that you have spent all of your life over there in that part of the country?" And Charlie Wright said, "Not yet." I hope Mr. Slattery will have the same reply to make. [Applause.]

TOASTMASTER. There are other resources besides our natural and physical resources; there are human resources. While we were here at dinner I had a long-distance call from William B. Wilson, former Secretary of Labor, who told me that he had expected to be in Washington and had hoped until the last minute that he would be able to attend this dinner, but he telephoned this message:

"I wish you would convey to Mr. Slattery my highest appreciation of the splendid services he has rendered during the period of his public life. Few men have had the opportunity to conserve the moral and material resources of a nation such as came to him, and the courage, integrity, and intelligence with which he has met every situation entitle him to the gratitude of all of his countrymen."

Mr. Wilson is one of the brave men and women who, like Harry Slattery, have been fighting for the preservation of human resources, and so I give you the toast, "To the preservation of the Nation's human resources, its men and women and children," and ask Mrs. Costigan to respond to that toast.

MRS. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, WIFE OF THE SENATOR FROM COLORADO

Mrs. COSTIGAN. Mr. Toastmaster and friends, when these ceremonies began Harry Slattery said, "Here is where I would like to go under the table." That made me think of a testimonial dinner I attended one time, given to my best friend in our home town when he was appointed a member of the Tariff Commission. There was a picture of Woodrow Wilson on the wall and a picture of my best friend. Ex-Senator Cannon, of Utah, one of the speakers on that occasion, was most eloquent. He finally turned to the pictures on the wall and exclaimed, "There they are, where they belong, hanging together!" To-night we are all where we belong, hanging together, as we always should be on occasions when we meet to honor one who has been our guide and inspiration on countless occasions.

Harry Slattery makes me think of the old saint whose ambition was to do all the good he could and never know anything about it. That is just the kind of saint he is.

I do not suppose Mr. Slattery recalls an occasion, which I well remember, when he saved some of us from a serious pitfall, at the time when the League of Women Voters was first considering how to deal with the Muscle Shoals issue. The ladies from Alabama had put the problem on our doorstep, saying, "You must save Muscle Shoals for the women of the South." We were considering the best way to dispose of Muscle Shoals, and our committee, thinking they knew a great deal about the Muscle Shoals project, met to decide what they should recommend to the convention of the League of Women Voters. When, as chairman, I realized the magnitude of the public issue, I did what so many women do—I called up a man and said: "What is the truth of this situation?" And before the vote came a few hours later, all the arguments were in our hands against the proposal of Henry Ford to lease Muscle Shoals. Who provided those arguments? Harry Slattery, of course. So, from time to time, he has saved that League of Women Voters, as legal adviser, from many difficulties. There were other troubles on our doorstep, but Mr. Slattery was always there telling us how to handle them.

Our times are serious and we need advice as never before. The people are in the coop, instead of the chickens in the pot. So, to-night, I bring here the tribute of all the women I have worked with in Washington during past years. We have come to tell Harry Slattery of our debt of gratitude and, here, before you all, to thank him for the many times he has saved us—this gentleman, this statesman, our friend, Harry Slattery.

TOASTMASTER. Now, we come to the time when our guest should at least let us know that he is glad to be with us. [Company rising, great applause.]

MR. HARRY SLATTERY

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Chairman and friends, it is not easy to speak on an occasion like this. I deeply appreciate all the kind things that have been said about me. I appreciate them more than you will ever know. At a time like this emotion sometimes takes away thoughts. Any man would be proud of this occasion and of these fine things, and of these friends. I have only one regret, and that is, that to-night my mother, who is 85 years old, could not be here. She has always held to and taught me the old Biblical principle that "He who gives his life, shall save it."

I feel a good deal like one of the early pioneers or like a charter member of the oldest inhabitants. Senator NORRIS has told you about the old Ballinger case. He did not tell you that in the fight in the Ballinger case he unseated Cannon and ended a political dynasty. But it seems I go so far back, it might be like a story I heard the other day of the old darky to whom some one was talking at Mount Vernon. He said he had been a slave owned by the Washington family. A visitor said: "Why, this is certainly unusual. You must remember General Washington." And he said, "Oh, I remember him well." "You knew him as a boy?" "Yes, sir, right there with him," the darky replied. "You must remember him when he took a hack at the cherry tree." And he said, "I certainly do, boss. I drove that hack—we had a good ride."

It is a great privilege and a great pleasure to have been in some way—a small way, associated with the progressive movement. Washington, after all, is a good deal the home of certain financial and social cliques; there is ballyhoo and playing for place or favor on all sides, sometimes either at the Capitol or at the White House; but I am sure that even if there is a good deal of artificial sham, ideals win out.

My years have taught me one thing, clear as crystal, and that is, that the progressive principles and the progressive ideals have won straight through. They might have their ups and downs, and they might have changes here and there, but they all work to solve our problems, every one, every day, and in many ways, and will always win; because I think we can safely rest our faith upon one principle that is above all others, and that is unselfishness and undying belief in the democratic ideals of the Nation.

I can recall very well when they had a great filibuster in the dying days of the Wilson administration, on the fight over the natural resources. That contest was led by the fighter who has gone from us, Senator La Follette. He would lie down at times with a great military cloak around him, like a general on the field of battle, preparing to renew the fight that was being carried on in the Senate night and day, day after day. One night I remember Senator Sherman spoke to him and said, "Bob, I think the end is in sight on this." But Senator La Follette said, "We will win this fight to-morrow, or eventually; we will win it."

It strikes me that is the story of the whole progressive movement—that American ideals will win to-day, they will win to-morrow, or they will eventually win.

The battle over these resources always seemed to me a long-time proposition. So many people do not seem to realize that legislation takes years. The conservation measures took from 7 to 15 years, whether water power, forests, coal, or oil, before they were enacted into law. Many people in this world want to win to-day. The reason why progressive ideals are eventually going to win is because those who support them realize it is a long-time proposition; and the fight goes always forward.

But I want to tell you one story about the oil leasing. Mr. Fall, when we conservationists started to question his activities as to the naval oil leases, used pretty strong language—he was a gentleman that used strong language—and he sent us to a certain place, where they do not keep refrigeration. Then Mr. Fall in his reign of terror—and I am sure Senator NORRIS and Senator LA FOLLETTE must remember those days—Mr. Fall decided he would use some rough tactics and he had a man by the name of Baracca, who was a 2-gun man and had passed several men over the Great Divide. Mr. Fall sent him around to several newspaper men to make inquiry, and I think he went to see Gilson Gardner. But anyway, he arrived to see me with a threat; and I want to cite this as an illustration of how tense those times were. I may be modest, but I kicked that gentleman out of my office. [Applause.]

One more observation and then I am through. In my opinion, when the whole story about water power is written, no part of it will be so complete as that marvelous fight for many, many years that Senator NORRIS has made for Muscle Shoals. He has exemplified the progressive spirit. In the days when he had no support he labored away and fought morning, noon, and night with his legislative resources, and he turned up both the Democratic and Republican propower groups on many occasions. What has been a great surprise to me is that the Southern representatives (I make apology to Senator BLACK, of course; I know Senator BLACK has been one of the stalwarts on the public side) have never seen that this was giving away a great birthright for a mess of pottage, and that the Muscle Shoals development is going to mean more to the economic development of the South than the cotton fields, the lumber resources, the plantations, or the other great resources of the South.

I want to thank you all again for this unusual and marvelous meeting. It will mean much in my life; it will mean, like the old story, that I will touch earth again with renewed strength to carry on the fight that I believe will always win. [Rising applause.]

TOASTMASTER. And now, ladies and gentlemen, God be with you 'till me meet again.

LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS RECEIVED

CHICAGO, ILL., July 13, 1932.

As one of the Washington correspondents, I have a personal knowledge of the high type of Mr. Slattery's public contributions. I know of no man in or out of public life who has labored so hard for the public welfare with such unselfish motives. Without him I doubt if there would have been a successful Teapot Dome investigation. That was only one of many achievements.

As a newspaperman close to the Teapot Dome story from its inception, I know what he did. If there is anyone who unselfishly, day in and day out, labors pro bono publico with no hope or anticipation of pecuniary reward, that man is Harry Slattery.

If Congress were filled with men of his type what a difference there would be in the attitude of the people toward government.

JOHN D. ERWIN,
Correspondent, Nashville Tennessean, Chattanooga News, Knoxville Journal, and formerly Chief Correspondent, New York Evening World.

SEBASCO ESTATES,
Via Bath, Me., July 1, 1932.

I should like to have been there and participated in this occasion. If there ever was a man faithful to the interests of the people, surely Slattery is entitled to that distinction. I am sure the meeting was a great success.

WILLIAM S. KENYON,
Judge, United States Circuit Court of Appeals.

CHARLESTON, S. C., June 25, 1932.

Permit me to join in paying tribute to Harry Slattery for his unselfish and patriotic contributions to the public service during the past 25 years. May God spare him to his country and his friends for many years to come.

JOHN I. COSGROVE,
Justice, Supreme Court of South Carolina.

NEW YORK CITY, July 8, 1932.

Harry Slattery is, and long has been, one of the ablest and most courageous and effective champions of the public interest at Washington. He knows the public law of this country as do few lawyers of our time, and he stands preeminent in the utilization of that knowledge for the public good. No one has a finer record in the whole field of conservation. In the great contests to save Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, the national forests, and the naval oil reserves for the benefit of the American people, he has played an essential and often a decisive part. I had hoped and planned to come to Washington for the dinner and count it a deep satisfaction to make this acknowledgment to him.

FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman The Power Authority of the State of New York.

UNITED STATES FLEET AIRCRAFT,
SCOUTING FORCE, U. S. S. "WRIGHT," FLAGSHIP,
San Diego, Calif., July 7, 1932.

I very much regret that I was unable to attend the dinner or to send a message of greeting in time for the dinner. More than anyone else, perhaps, in the Navy, I appreciate the great public service that Harry Slattery gave the Navy and the Nation in the matter of the naval petroleum reserves.

JOHN HALLIGAN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 13, 1932.

I have personal knowledge of some of Harry Slattery's work, and much more of it I know from what others have told me. That this work has been of great importance in the public interest is certain, and it is equally certain that he has been so modest and self-effacing that he has escaped the general public recognition of merit which was his due. It is a delight to honor such a man, and I sincerely hope that for the future he may not lack the strength and opportunity to continue along the same old lines. He can serve his country in no better way.

JOSEPH B. EASTMAN,
Member Interstate Commerce Commission.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 25, 1932.

Leaving for Chicago, otherwise would join with you in honoring Harry Slattery for his fine social service through a quarter of a century. If democracy is to be preserved it will be through the tireless and unselfish service of just such militant champions of social justice.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 23, 1932.

Harry Slattery's untiring efforts in behalf of the conservation of the natural resources of this country have proved a real contribution to that cause and have inspired others to join the fight. Never before has this Nation needed men of sound but liberal views as it does to-day. By honoring those who have spent years in the fight, we attract others to the standard of progressiveism. May God spare Harry Slattery and all others like him to continue on for many years to come.

FRANKLYN WALTMAN, Jr.,

To Harry Slattery: About the most useful citizen this country has produced. I wish I could be there to greet him.

Nothing would have given me greater pleasure than to sit among my friends for the purpose of doing honor to a man who has labored so hard and so long in the public interest.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22, 1932.

I take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the splendid service rendered by Mr. Slattery for the public welfare. May his power and good influence increase in the coming years.

J. H. SINCLAIR,
United States Representative from North Dakota.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 25, 1932.

It is difficult to put on paper my opinion of Harry. I find it is a queer mixture of warm, personal affection for a dear friend and deep admiration for the ability and courage of a veteran battler for the common good.

When I came to Washington 20 years ago I found Harry a charter member of the "Hell Raisers." He made the ammunition other men used. They got the glory while Harry—always smiling, always self-effacing—was content in the knowledge that he had contributed to the job of blowing special privilege and political roguery out of their trenches.

During the last 20 years the progressives have done great work here in Washington, and Harry Slattery—God bless him—is entitled to a lot of the credit.

As a "son of the wild jackass," I doff my chapeau in heart-felt tribute to this fine gentleman from the old South.

EDWARD KEATING,
Manager Labor, Official Newspaper of the Standard Railroad Brotherhoods.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 22, 1932.

I am very glad indeed that a group of Mr. Slattery's friends is thus going to honor his 25 years of public service. He has done yeoman's work, all the more to be praised as it has been so modest and self-sacrificing that the public has failed to hear of him as it ought and to honor him for his noteworthy patriotic services. I regret that I can not testify by my presence to my own appreciation of what he has done.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,
Editor The Nation.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 23, 1932.

I regret very much that the Democrats are keeping me away from the dinner for Harry Slattery.

He richly deserves this testimonial. Will you please convey to him my warmest regards and say that I count it an honor to have had his friendship? Surely we need not despair of our Republic when there are still some men like Harry Slattery to carry the torch of truth and justice.

CHARLES G. ROSS,
Washington Correspondent St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

I would like to express my appreciation of the long and effective public service which Harry Slattery has rendered and my hope that he may be permitted by the mysterious powers that allot health and economic security to continue his useful labors for many many years.

DONALD R. RICHBERG.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 25, 1932.

Harry Slattery is the kind we will have more of when we get really civilized. They do not come any more dependable, able, socially-minded, warm-hearted, and self-effacing. Any listing of the public causes on which he has left his impress makes quite a catalogue. I get a real kick thinking about his splendid services and feel a sense of deep gratitude for his cooperation.

Very sorry I will not be able to be in Washington on June 25. My congratulations and my gratitude go to Mr. Slattery. I hope the dinner celebrates the beginning of another quarter century of service.

BREMERTON, WASH., June 28, 1932.

It certainly would have been a matter of the greatest pleasure for me to have been able to attend that dinner and pay my tribute to the good work that Harry Slattery has done during all these years. He has been forever on the job and has never failed in any requirement or appointment in line with his duty. He has been the right hand of the great and mighty and has been the everlasting foe of those who would undermine progressive and righteous efforts.

I believe in Harry Slattery with all my heart and want you to assure him of my perpetual confidence, love, and affection.

NAKOMA FARMS,

It is pleasant to think of that fine group assembled to honor one whose ability and single-minded devotion to the cause of righteousness and integrity in Government and politics during these 25 years have won him the love and admiration of those who have been close enough to him to understand and recognize that his sensitiveness and modesty have prevented the general recognition which might have been accorded to him.

MRS. LAURA C. WILLIAMS.

CALF PASTURE COVE,

I should have liked so much to have added my voice to the chorus of those who appreciate Harry Slattery's long years of valiant service; especially nowadays when the world rocks about us.

MARY FOULKE MORRISSON.

CAPE ELIZABETH, ME., June 27, 1932.

Mr. Harry Slattery's unique service to good government seems to me to be made up of two elements: First, the extent and variety of his knowledge about public affairs and about men and women in public life; second, his single-minded and selfless devotion to the ideals in which he has faith.

Like hundreds of others, I am deeply grateful for all that he is and has done.

MAUD WOOD PARK.

SCRANTON, PA., June 22, 1932.

I congratulate Harry Slattery upon the twenty-fifth anniversary of his public service. He has in the last quarter of a century been faithful and progressive, and the results of his labors make a record of which he and his friends may be very proud.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24, 1932.

If there is any man in Washington who has consistently demonstrated genuine capacity for purely patriotic service, that man is Harry Slattery. He deserves more honor than he is ever likely to get, and all of the tribute that will be paid to him to-morrow night will go only a short distance on the road to the recognition his service merits. There are plenty in this world who are willing to do the right thing and often do do it very ably for a sufficient reward in either cash or notoriety, but everyone who knows Harry Slattery understands that here is one queer bird who goes along doing the right thing all the time for the sake of doing it.

CHESTER M. WRIGHT,
Editor International Labor News Service.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 23, 1932.

I am really surprised that any friends of Harry Slattery should actually think they know anything about the good public service that Harry has rendered to the community. Do they not know that he has always disobeyed those most ancient of injunctions and hid his light under a bushel and buried his talent in the ground? But, then, the bushel always caught on fire, and the talent turned out to be a smokeless and noiseless bomb that lifted things out of the waters of corruption. What would not the great destroyers of humanity give for that kind of an explosive force! But, luckily, the friends of Harry Slattery have had that force on their side and can now gather to tell him so in the simple words that would most please him, I am sure.

I have personal knowledge of Mr. Slattery's splendid service and direct personal aid in this movement, from the days when as a newcomer I challenged wasteful appropriations by the House. WASHINGTON, D. C., June 21, 1932.

I have fought alongside with Harry since the hell raiser days of 1913. He has served the old cause with unswerving devotion, with all his energy, directed by an unusually wise head. He has never shown a yellow streak nor hesitated to go to the front because he was not paid.

A list of the things Harry has accomplished successfully, and for which he has been given and for which he has sought no credit would be an imposing array. The story of his life and experiences would be more fascinating than any novel I know of and more valuable than any known treatise on current history or political science. He knows how things actually happen to happen.

It is for the interest of the country to see that he has another 25 years of service.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 5, 1932.

I hope it is not too late for me to say how highly I value the public services of Harry Slattery not only in the field of conservation but in the entire field of liberal economic measures. There are people who get a great deal of public acclaim for whatever they do, and I am glad for them. There are, however, people of his type who do a prodigious amount of work of which only a few of their closest friends are aware. I therefore am delighted that some friends thought of paying him the tribute which he has so richly earned for unobtrusive, quiet, but effective work. I have not yet lost faith in the sense of justice and reason of the American people, and some of these days this conscience that has been slumbering will come to the front once more and people will turn to its real and true leaders for guidance.

Permit me to acknowledge my personal indebtedness to him for all he has done in forestry.

DEDICATION OF CAPITOL OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the State of West Virginia and the citizens of West Virginia dedicated a new State capitol a few days ago, and I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings, a report of which appeared in a local newspaper, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette, June 21, 1932]

CAPITOL DEDICATED AS GIFT TO STATE ON ITS SIXTY-NINTH BIRTHDAY—THOUSANDS ATTEND COLORFUL CEREMONY; HEAR CITIZENSHIP EXTOLLED BY GOFF—OFFICIAL RECEPTION HELD AS DAY'S CLOSING EVENT—MISS JARVIS, GOVERNOR CONLEY, AND SENATOR CHILTON ARE SPEAKERS

By Clyde H. East

A present to the State of West Virginia by its people on its State's sixty-ninth birthday, the new capitol was dedicated yesterday as thousands inspected the government's elaborate quarters and later gathered in the concourse behind the main unit to hear the dedication addresses and formal acceptance on behalf of the people by Gov. William G. Conley.

The first State reception to be held in the magnificent reception room of the governor's suite last night closed the day's events. The chief executive and six other elective State officers making up the board of public works greeted a seemingly never-ending line of visitors.

Various estimates of the number of persons who participated in the dedication were offered. Many agreed that 15,000 had visited the statehouse during the day, and they came from every corner of the State. Included in the number were persons prominent in the political, social, and industrial life of West Virginia.

DEDICATED TO POSTERITY

Throughout the dedication a scorching sun beat upon the thousands grouped on the capitol lawn. Relief from the blazing heat came near the close of Governor Conley's address of acceptance. Like a curtain descending at the end of a play, semidarkness brought on by a sudden storm fell just as the National Guard band played West Virginia Hills at the conclusion of the afternoon ceremonies.

It grew darker swiftly until, as the final bars of the State's anthem were played, wind whistled through the trees and dark clouds raced across the sky.

The capitol was dedicated to posterity by former United States Senator Guy D. Goff, of Clarksburg, as "a temple to the God-like in man who realizes that worldwide prosperity, the success of nature, lies in concord, not strife, in the things of the mind, not the powers of the arm."

EMBLEMATIC OF THE PEOPLE

The building was accepted by Governor Conley as symbolic in its sturdy strength of the pioneer stock from which West Virginians spring. "These pillars and columns," he said, "are emblematic of the characteristics of our people—honesty, integrity, and industry—are also indicative of the ambitions of our citizens."

A colorful parade, headed by Col. R. L. Osborn, superintendent of State police, and Chief of Police John Britton, of Charleston, preceded the dedication exercises. The entire program was carried out as planned. The addresses were brief and the thousands listened attentively to the speakers.

Former United States Senator William E. Chilton presided at the ceremony. He referred to the capitol as "the finest in the United States" and congratulated the people upon its completion.

The voices of the speakers were carried to the outermost fringes of the crowd by batteries of amplifiers.

MONUMENT TO MOTHERS

Miss Anna Jarvis, founder of Mother's Day and a native of Grafton, was the first speaker introduced by Senator Chilton. She termed the capitol "a fitting monument to the sacrifices, the devotion, the industry, and the hopes of West Virginia mothers."

Miss Jarvis said she "would offer this building as though it came from the visible work and hands of these women of the State. I would offer it as the true home of West Virginia—a building in which every mother and the son of every mother has an even right to its usefulness, its ownership, and its duty—a building in which every citizen, now living, as well as unborn, are equal and even possessors, share and share alike, and of which none can deprive them."

The elements of greatness, she said, "have always been shown by West Virginia. To-day the State passes another milestone toward the goal of true greatness. To-day, this State honors its homes and mothers as has no other State and nation. To-day for the first time in history the mothers have a part in the dedication of a great public edifice. It is an honor to every West Virginia home. It is a tribute to every West Virginia mother; it is a movement that other States and countries will follow in paying tribute to the mothers of all mankind.

"May we realize that this building stands for truth, for justice, and for integrity, and for the hopes and ambitions of all West Virginia mothers."

Cass Gilbert, capitol architect, sent a telegram saying he regretted his inability to be present. He was represented by his son, Cass Gilbert, jr., who was introduced to the crowd by Senator Chilton.

LIBERTY IS GUARANTEED

Both Senator Goff and Governor Conley expressed hope that future occupants of the capitol would conduct themselves in such manner that the faith of the people in their system of government shall never be shaken.

"Too many people are trying to get something out of their country and too few are willing to give and serve," Senator Goff declared. He stated "in these days the State is continually asked to assume additional functions, because many believe that the State should take the place of individual initiative and reduce all men to the dead level of the most incompetent.

"No government ever made or ever will make a people great except as it guarantees the liberty whereby the people shall make themselves great. No people ever have made or ever will make themselves great by relying upon their government to do for them the things they should do for themselves."

UNSELFISHNESS DEMANDED

Senator Goff continued that the principal need of the Nation today is "citizens who are not afraid of the demagogues and the unprincipled, selfish, time-serving politicians who, for selfish and sordid reasons, have interfered with matters they do not understand, until they have retarded recovery and made the people believe that they are constantly being cheated * * * until confidence is destroyed and honor always questioned."

He referred to law enforcement with a statement that "disrespect for law is one of our cankering sins." If it is allowed to continue "it will mean the destruction of individual rights, the family, and the Nation."

"Never, in all her onward and upward march," the speaker added, "was West Virginia more needed than now as a teacher of the priceless lessons of American liberty to our citizens, both native and foreign born."

HISTORY OF STATE TRACED

Governor Conley traced the history of hardy pioneers that carved out their homes in the wilderness, now West Virginia, and of the State moving through the years "progressing step by step in all lines of endeavor, until we stand here to-day and behold the most beautiful capitol building in the United States, the home of the government of West Virginia.

"As our footsteps pass echoing down the corridors of time our work will be taken over by our children, whose footsteps to-day echo down the corridors of these buildings. In a large measure it is for them and their children and their children's children that we have built here structures which typify the State of West Virginia and her people.

"Just as these massive walls can stand only when they are constructed on a firm foundation of an honest, alert, and intelligent public * * *. Let it be our dedication and acceptance prayer that the leaders in government, who utilize the facilities here provided, will so order their work as to continue confidence in government and its purposes and may that confidence continue so long as government lasts."

MOTHERS EXPRESS APPROVAL

It is appropriate, he said, "that the mothers of this great State, through their representative, the founder of Mother's Day throughout the civilized world, who is here in person, have expressed their approval of this effort to dignify West Virginia by a capitol that stands for the past, the present, and the future greatness of the State"

A silent tribute was paid by the big crowd, at the request of Senator Chilton, to the memory of the six members of the capitol commission who have died—Frederick M. Staunton and William A. MacCorkle, of Charleston; Boyd Jarrell, of Huntington; Harry P. Camden, of Parkersburg; N. Price Whittaker, of Wheeling; and Virgil L. Highland, of Clarksburg.

Surviving members of the commission, many of whom occupied places of honor on the north portico of the main unit near the speakers, are former Gov. E. F. Morgan, former Gov. Howard M. Gore, Governor Conley, Gohen C. Arnold, Edwin M. Keatley, Herbert Fitzpatrick, George A. Laughlin, Senator Mont Z. White, J. William Cummins, Charles W. Dillon, and Charles K. Payne.

MANY LEGISLATORS HERE

Many members of the legislature, headed by their presiding officers, Senator White, president of the senate, and J. Alfred Taylor, speaker of the house of delegates, were on the platform. They expressed pride in the capitol, and several of them who expect to be members of the next legislature said they were looking forward to the session in January when they will occupy the new legislative chambers.

It was the biggest birthday party in West Virginia history. Streets were bedecked with flags and a carnival spirit prevailed as the thousands of citizens gathered to present their gift to the State.

The visitors hurried to the massive gray stone structure on the banks of the Kanawha to walk through its marble halls, awed by its simple beauty.

ESCORTED THROUGH BUILDING

There guides, employees of the various State departments, escorted the citizens through their own capitol building, through the reception room in the governor's suite, termed by many as the most beautiful room in the State, through the three rotundas, two small and one massive, where far overhead glistened a many-faceted chandelier hanging from the top of a sky-blue dome.

Many also climbed the stairs to the legislative chambers and were shown through the two office buildings flanking the main unit.

Meanwhile airplanes droned overhead, lending their part to the celebration of the 10-year capitol task started after destruction of the old capitol by fire in 1921.

To-day will be "open-house day" at the capitol. Many of the visitors remained in Charleston overnight and they are expected to visit the statehouse and glimpse the officials and employees at work.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations in the Regular Army, which was referred to the committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. REED. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I report routine nominations, and ask unanimous consent that they may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be reported.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations.

Mr. REED. I ask that the nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report certain nominations and ask unanimous consent that they may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be reported.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of postmasters.

Mr. HEBERT. I ask that the nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed.

Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

PROTOCOLS CONCERNING THE ADHERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Executive A, protocols concerning adherence of the United States to the Court of International Justice.

Mr. MOSES. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty will go over.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Executive L, a convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed at Mexico City June 18, 1932, extending the duration of the Special Claims Commission provided for in the convention between the two countries of September 10, 1923, together with a protocol concerning the extending convention, signed at the same time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether we will have another short executive session before we adjourn?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if we do not conclude the consideration of all the nominations on the calendar, we can have an executive session to-morrow afternoon before adjournment.

Mr. KING. I make the inquiry because the Senator from Idaho has reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations a very important treaty on Mexico. I have not had an opportunity to examine it. I received a copy of it just a few moments ago through the courtesy of the Senator, and if there is to be an executive session to-morrow, I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to it going over?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, with the understanding that there will be an executive session to-morrow, I am glad to accommodate the Senator from Utah. But may I have an understanding with the Senator from Utah that it may be disposed of to-morrow?

Mr. KING. As far as I am concerned, I may vote against it; but I have no objection to the Senate passing upon it to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the treaty will go over.

CHARLES J. MOOS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nomination of Charles J. Moos to be postmaster at St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I suggest that that go over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that suggestion a moment——

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to.

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is much interested in early consideration of this nomination, and on his request I am going to make inquiry if it will not be agreeable to the Senator from Wisconsin to consider the matter at the first executive session in December?

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. With that understanding——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the nomination would have to be made again.

Mr. BLAINE. May I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the postmaster has been holding over after the expiration of his term for nearly two and a half years?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not making any objection. I am just suggesting that the present nomination will not be before us at the next session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is correct, that if the nomination is not confirmed, the papers must go back to the President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion, the only reason the matter would have to go back to the President is because of a Senate rule, which can be suspended by unanimous consent. If that is not done, it will be impossible, except by unanimous consent, to consider the nomination at the first executive session in December.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope there will not be a request for unanimous consent, because this is a very unusual case, and there are many charges. I hope that no request for unanimous consent will be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to this nomination going over. I am not anxious to have it taken up at all. But I would object, even if it could be brought about by unanimous consent, which I doubt, to the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not see how we can confirm this nomination anyway, with the opposition there is.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the nomination is again sent to the Senate, I will be perfectly willing to take the matter up and dispose of it at the first executive session in December.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. Is not this matter to be thrashed out now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Request has been made that the matter be passed over, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has suggested that if the nomination is made again it may be taken up at the first executive session in December.

Mr. SCHALL. Are we to have an executive session to-morrow?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I tried to answer that question a few moments ago. It is somewhat indefinite, but if there is any strong reason for it, we will have an executive session.

Mr. SCHALL. I would like to have this matter disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will go over for to-day.

Mr. SCHALL. Can we not have an understanding that it will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, at the last executive session I stated that I would move to-day to take the matter up. If there is any possibility of getting the matter disposed of, I would like to have it done to-day. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin would like to discuss the case, as he has a right to do, and I do not want to shut him off from having ample time to discuss it, but it seems to me we ought to be able to dispose of it at this session, if the Senate is so inclined, even if it leads to some extended debate.

I realize full well how tired Senators are, and that they would not like to stay longer this evening, but I do not know when we are to adjourn finally. If there will be time to dispose of it to-morrow, very well. I do not like to make the motion to proceed to consider the matter unless the Senate feels that they want to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. As I said before, I have no interest in the matter, but this man is now holding the office, he is holding over, it would be no detriment to him if it should go over, and there would be no great damage done, because he would still be holding the office. It is true that when we convene in December the President would have to send his name in again, would have to renominate him, but in the meantime he would be acting as postmaster, so there is no very great damage to him if he is finally confirmed, because it means a longer term for him than though he were confirmed now.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is quite right about that. He would get a commission for four years.

I would say for the benefit of the Senator from Minnesota that in my opinion the parliamentary situation is such that, the nomination being on the calendar, it is automatically before us, and it will require a motion or unanimous consent to send it over. The Senator from Minnesota, if he wishes to go on with it to-day, can do so in the absence of any affirmative action to the contrary by the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination go over until December, to be considered at the first executive session in December.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I object to the nomination going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Minnesota objects. The question is on the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is 6 o'clock. I assumed that the matter would not be taken up to-day. I have sent to my office for my records, and I have also sent to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for certain records which are in the possession of the committee. I do not like to weary the Senate with any long discussion of the matter from memory. I would much prefer to state the facts from the record, because it is purely a question of record.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the able Senator that I think the nomination might go over until to-morrow. I think some agreement may be reached then.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I think I ought, in good conscience, to advise the Senator that I expect to leave Washington before that session could be held. I do not want to leave without giving the Senator that information.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, while the Senator from Wisconsin is waiting for his papers, could we not dispose of the rest of the calendar?

Mr. BLAINE. It is a question of how long the Senate desires to continue in session this afternoon.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we can dispose of the other matters, we shall conclude our business for the afternoon just that much earlier.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the St. Paul nomination will be passed over temporarily and the clerk will state the next business on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Doyle M. England to be postmaster at New Tazewell, Tenn.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John D. Fatheree to be postmaster at Hebbronville, Tex.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask that that nomination go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Fred A. Bradley to be collector of customs at Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination go over.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. What will be the status of Fred A. Bradley if action is not taken at this session of Congress? Would he continue to serve?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination would expire and papers will have to go back to the President.

Mr. COUZENS. But does he continue to serve between now and the 1st of December if the President so desires?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is for the President to determine. If the nominee is in office he would probably continue to serve, but the Chair does not care to pass final judgment on that point. The Chair is of the opinion, however, that if he is in office he would continue to serve. At the request of the Senator from Utah the nomination goes over.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nominations of William W. Butterworth, jr., Lewis Clark, and Paul W. Meyer to be secretaries in the Diplomatic Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask that calendar No. 5029, the nomination of Louis P. Cross, to be postmaster at Clayton, Ga., be passed over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I ask that all nominations of postmasters, except the one nomination in Georgia just passed over, may be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXCLUSION OF ALIEN COMMUNISTS

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, while the matter of the postmaster at St. Paul is pending and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is waiting for his papers, I want to make reference to a legislative matter upon the calendar. Calendar No. 865, the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, was passed by the House, came to the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Immigration, and on June 11 was reported back to the Senate favorably and without amendment. In other words, the bill has been on the calendar of the Senate since June 11. I think it is a very important piece of legislation and I do not know why it has not been brought up by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration [Mr. HATFIELD]. I would like very much to see the legislation disposed of before the adjournment of this session of the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Florida that this is an important bill, but its consideration has been objected to every time we have had a call of the calendar. I should be very glad to join with the distinguished Senator from Florida to-morrow, or any time when we are in legislative session, in pressing a motion to take the bill from the calendar and to give it immediate consideration.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator. I hope we will have an opportunity to-morrow to take up the bill and dispose of it. It should be disposed of.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a point of order. I understand we are in executive session.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. We are in executive session and engaged in a call of the executive calendar. Why do we not proceed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Executive business must be considered if there is objection to the Senator from Florida proceeding.

Mr. McNARY. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has performed a distinct valuable public service in directing attention to the fact that the Senate should not adjourn unless and until it shall have passed the bill providing for the deportation of criminal aliens who are unlawfully in the United States. I congratulate the Senator from Florida upon his courage in the matter. At this time, too, before I resume my seat, I wish to congratulate the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, who reported the bill favorably. I conclude by saying that our country does not need the presence of criminal aliens who are here unlawfully. Let us hope that to-morrow the Senate will not adjourn until it shall have passed the bill.

CHARLES J. MOOS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have conferred with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] who has consented to withdraw his objection to the nomination of the St. Paul postmaster going over until December. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Mr. Moos may go over until December, to be acted on at the first executive session in December.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announced before that when the Senate adjourns the papers must be returned to the President. That action could not be taken until the President sends in the nomination again.

Mr. McNARY. By unanimous consent it can be done. That is only done by virtue of a rule of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule can be suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I am asking to have done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] gave notice that he would object to that proceeding.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I object to a suspension of the rule. I do not think there is going to be any practical difficulty about the matter, but if we are going to start in now to grant unanimous consent to take up matters at a subsequent session of the Senate, we ought to act under the rule. If we adjourn for more than 30 days the nomination automatically goes back to the President. I do not want to establish that kind of a precedent, and particularly in this case, in which I again say I have no interest. The nominee is holding the office now and to delay it does not involve any damage to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the nomination will be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to renew my statement that if the papers are returned to the President and the nomination is renewed, I shall be willing to take up the matter without any obstructive tactics at the first executive session in December.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmations made to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, July 16, 1932, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JULY 15, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. David Campbell Mayers, of the Episcopal Church of Middleburg, Va., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Heavenly Father, who hast given us this good land for our heritage, fill our hearts, we pray Thee, with a true sense of gratitude, and help us to realize our responsibility for its happiness and welfare at home, its honor and usefulness abroad.

We beseech Thy continual favor and guidance to those who have been chosen as the counselors and leaders of this Nation. Give to them such clearness of vision, such ripeness of judgment, such resoluteness of purpose that they may ever perform the duties of their high office without fear or favor of any man.

In the day of national perplexity and distress make them to put their whole trust and confidence in Thee, who wilt give wisdom and understanding for every problem of government.

When the needy cry for help, when the oppressed demand justice, when the unemployed seek for labor, when the doubtful and hesitant look for constructive leadership, raise up Thy power in these men and come among us through them, and with great might succor us in the day of our necessity.

O Lord, how great is this task. How serious is this responsibility. Guide this House of Representatives by Thy Holy Spirit, so that all things may be settled by their endeavors upon the best and surest foundations, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

From ocean to ocean and from border to border bring together as one happy people those who have come hither from many lands; and give to America, our common country, that real wealth which comes from contentment and that true prosperity which is the fruit of righteousness, so that all the world may say, "Happy is that people that is in such a case; yea, happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

All which we humbly ask in the name of Jesus Christ, our most blessed Lord and Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL RELIEF BILL

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the Senate announcing its further disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1 and further insisting upon its amendment No. 2 to the House bill H. R. 9642, an act to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment, and asking for a further conference with the House and notifying the House that it had appointed Mr. NORBECK, Mr. BROOKHART, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. WAGNER conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Messrs. COLLIER, RAINEY, DOUGHTON, HAWLEY, and TREADWAY.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have leave to extend their own remarks in the RECORD until the last issue of the RECORD during the recess. Usually this is 10 or 15 days after the adjournment of Congress, but notice indicating the date of the last issue will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman so qualify his request that Members may be privileged to extend their remarks only once?

Mr. RAINEY. That is not the usual way in which it is done.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the Members should have the right to extend their remarks ad infinitum, as many times as they please. I have no objection to their extending their remarks once.

Mr. RAINEY. I am making the usual request. This is the request which was made at the close of the Seventy-first Congress and granted.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was not made in prior Congresses, as I recall.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; it was. I looked it up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to granting all the Members the privilege of extending their remarks on one occasion. If they want to do it more than once, let them stand here and ask for the special privilege.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That is the proper procedure and I shall object if it is not followed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 288

Resolved, That all Members of the House shall have leave to extend their own remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until the last issue of the RECORD of the present session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has control of the time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order. Personally I have no objection to the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules, but is it not necessary to get unanimous consent to have this resolution considered immediately?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MAPES. Is not this a report from the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAPES. Does not the rule provide that a report from the Committee on Rules shall stand over one day?

The SPEAKER. It does unless two-thirds vote the other way. The Chair will read the rule to the gentleman if he desires.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman is familiar with the rule.

The SPEAKER. This is the rule:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules (except it shall not be called up for consideration on the same day it is presented to the House, unless so determined by a vote of not less than two-thirds of the Members voting, but this provision shall not apply during the last three days of the session).

The second clause of the exception applies to this resolution. Unless two-thirds of the Members of the House vote in favor of considering the resolution to-day, it could not be adopted to-day.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. It would seem to me the House should take action on the specific motion as to whether or not it will consider the resolution as reported by the Rules Committee before the resolution is called up for a vote. That motion might carry by two-thirds vote and then the House could act upon the resolution reported by the committee; but if the Speaker may place before the House immediately any resolution reported from the Committee on Rules without any notice, then the membership of the House is not protected at all, because in that case any rule or resolution that is brought out by the Committee on Rules may be placed upon its immediate passage.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is asking a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will attempt to answer it; but if the gentleman intends to make an argument, the Chair will not recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. MAPES. I made a point of order. If the Speaker has ruled, that is all there is to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he could recognize any member of the Committee on Rules to call up any resolution reported by that committee; and if two-thirds of the Members voted for its consideration, it would become the order of the House.

Mr. MAPES. But, if the Speaker will permit, the rule expressly provides that during the last six days of the session the Speaker is authorized to recognize anyone to move to suspend the rules. Now, it does not seem to me this rule is the same as that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again read that provision of the rule, and the membership of the House can determine.

(Except it shall not be called up for consideration on the same day it is presented to the House, unless so determined by a vote of not less than two-thirds of the Members voting, but this provision shall not apply during the last three days of the session.)

Mr. MAPES. I do not want to appear to be contentious about the matter, but let me make sure that I make my point clear. The rule provides that it shall not be called up unless two-thirds of the House determine that it shall be. Now, my point is that the Speaker himself is determining that it shall be called up when he puts the question before the House and that the House ought to determine in advance whether it is to be called up or not.

The SPEAKER. That seems to the Chair easily settled. The question is, Shall the House consider the resolution? That will satisfy the gentleman, I suppose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I waive my right to the floor and yield it to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I want to make myself clear. I am not opposing this resolution at all, but I do think we ought not to establish a precedent which will allow the Speaker to put a resolution or a report from the Committee on Rules until the House itself decides that it should be put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the same opinion. The question is, Shall the House consider this resolution?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 201, noes 20.

So two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the question was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, what is the report?

The SPEAKER. It is a conference report.

Mr. SCHAFER. On what?

The SPEAKER. On the home loan bank bill.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement see proceedings of the House of July 14, 1932.)

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 46: Page 41, after line 9, insert:

"SEC. 29. That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of three years from the date of enactment of this act all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3⅜ per cent per annum, shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of circulating notes to national banking associations, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a national banking association of any such bonds, such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations now provided by law in the case of 2 per cent gold bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege; except that the limitation contained in section 9 of the act of July 12, 1882, as amended, with respect to the amount of lawful money which may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by national banking associations for the purpose of withdrawing bonds held as security for their circulating notes, shall not apply to the bonds of the United States to which the circulation privilege is extended by this section and which are held as security for such notes. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which now bear the circulation privilege.

"As used in this section, the word 'bonds' shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

"There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. (After counting.) One hundred and ninety-one gentlemen present, not a quorum.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-one gentlemen have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEAGALL moves that the House recede and concur in the amendment of the Senate No. 46, with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment, insert the following:

"SEC. 29. (a) That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of three years from the date of enactment of this act, all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3⅜ per cent per annum, shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of circulating notes to national banking associations, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a national banking association of any such bonds, such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations now provided by law in the case of 2 per cent gold bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege, except that the limitation contained in section 9 of the act of July 12, 1882, as amended, with respect to the amount of lawful money which may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by national banking associations for the purpose of withdrawing bonds held as security for their circulating notes, shall not apply to the bonds of the United States to which the circulation privilege is extended by this subsection and which are held as security for such notes. Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which now bear the circulation privilege.

"(b) As used in subsection (a), the word 'bonds' shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

"(c) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of subsection (a).

"(d) The Federal reserve act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"'SEC. 31. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency.'

"(e) The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective the policy set forth in subsection (d).

"(f) Acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of subsection (d) or (e) are hereby repealed."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MAPES and Mr. CHINDBLOM joined in the point of order.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of section 29 of the bill deals with the increasing of the circulating medium under the provisions permitting the use of certain classes of United States bonds. The amendment as read is the Goldsborough bill, proposing to direct the Federal reserve system, in the pursuit of its direction of operations, to pay particular attention to the stabilization of the price level. I think these are two distinct and different matters, and therefore the matter is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, this point of order is of the most serious importance, quite apart from the subject matter concerned. It involves the integrity of parliamentary law as it is enforced in the House of Representatives.

In another branch the rule of germaneness does not apply, and there are those who greatly regret that our House practice is not the universal practice in all legislative bodies. With us it is well established, and has been for a hundred years and more, that the House shall not be taken by surprise by proposals to which it has given no consideration in connection with the pending legislation.

The pending legislation in this matter is for the establishment of home-loan banks to be of benefit to 25,000,000 and more of our people. There has been injected here by motion a proposal to relieve the pending distress in finance by a distinct and separate measure which, to be sure, has been once debated in the House, but never has been debated in connection with this bill. It distracts the attention of the House from the bill itself and puts into prominence this proposal of which neither the present Members nor the absent Members have had any warning as likely to come up in connection with the pending measure. Member after Member has come to me this morning and asked me what is the purport and intent of this motion. The House is taken completely by surprise and completely without any opportunity to pass deliberate judgment upon this proposal as an excresence on the home loan bank bill.

Now, sir, if I understand aright the function of conferees, it is to lay before each other, those from each branch presenting the views of its own body, the differences between the two branches.

There were laid before our conferees yesterday 47 differences between the two branches, some of them merely technical, to be sure, but not a few of importance. The points at issue had all been considered in committee or on the floor of at least one House and had been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The parliamentary presumption is that every Senator and Representative had or could have had notice of them.

Then at the end of the conference came this proposal to add the Goldsborough bill. It had not in this connection been in difference between the two branches. Upon it the two branches, in connection with this bill, had never acted. It was a proposal that had not been discussed on the floor or publicly elsewhere in connection with the home loan bank bill.

Its introduction here violates a principle for which the House has stood, the principle that every member of the minority and majority alike shall know of especial occasion for attendance, and shall have opportunity to discuss, listen, reflect, and then vote. Instead, most of the Members are here taken by surprise, are without warning, without opportunity, confronted with an unrelated proposal that now is for the first time presented in connection with the pending legislation. Because this violates the parliamentary principles of the House, because it violates the integrity of our parliamentary law, I maintain that the motion is not in order. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the original bill, H. R. 12280, related solely to creating Federal home-loan banks and various necessary provisions in regard thereto. The Senate added an amendment, section 29 in the bill before us, which relates exclusively to the matter of increasing the circulating medium of the country by amending the general law upon that subject, the act of July 9, 1882.

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senate amendment does not refer to or relate to the Federal reserve system. It amends an act passed way back in July, 1882, before the Federal reserve system was established. That Senate amendment, if offered on the floor of the House, would have been out of order. I am certain that the Chair and other parliamentarians in the House will agree to that proposition.

When an amendment comes to the House from the Senate, a point of order can not be raised on the ground that it is not germane to the original bill, but when the House considers that Senate amendment, the House may not add anything to the Senate amendment that is not germane to it. The House may not further violate the rule against germaneness.

Now, it is proposed to amend the Senate amendment by adding to it what is known as the Goldsborough bill, which was passed by the House some time ago, for restoring and maintaining the purchasing value of the dollar.

Incidentally, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senate itself struck out the Goldsborough bill and substituted for it the so-called Borah amendment, which is section 29 in the pending bill. That amendment would have been out of order if it had been offered on the floor of the House to the original Goldsborough bill. We do not now have the question as to whether we can add a third or fourth subject to two subjects that have already been included in the bill, because in this instance the first subject is that which was put in the bill by the House, and which was the exclusive subject of that bill, and the second subject is one that was put in the bill by the Senate and which, under the rules of the House, would not be germane and would not be in order on the original House bill.

The question is now: Shall this House, and shall the Speaker in passing on this point of order, hold that after the House has passed a bill relating to one subject, wholly and exclusively, and the Senate has added an amendment to that bill relating to another subject, wholly and exclusively, not germane to the original bill, then the House itself may add another amendment, which is not germane to either one of the other two propositions? As stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] the question is one of great importance for the orderly procedure of business in the House. If the House is to be subjected to all kinds of nongermane amendments, all kinds of new amendments violative of the rules of the House, simply because another body has already added an amendment which here would be subject to a point of order, then I say to the Speaker we may as well discard the rule relating to germaneness entirely in the procedure of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Gladly.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the gentleman's position, it is that where the Senate puts on an amendment that is not germane to the bill, no other amendment can be placed to that amendment, however germane it might be to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; the gentleman from Illinois did not say that. The gentleman from Illinois tried to say definitely and distinctly that to the Senate amendment a nongermane amendment may not be added by the House, and that the violation of the rule of germaneness can not be enlarged under the rules of the House in its application to a Senate amendment, simply because it is a Senate amendment. The Senate amendment comes to the House with the simple privilege that we can not raise a point of order against it, but we can not add an amendment in the House which is not germane to the Senate amendment in the first place, and which violates the rule of germaneness further than does the amendment of the Senate itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman, and his sole argument is that the Goldsborough bill is not germane to what is known as the Glass bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not germane to the Glass amendment, nor is it germane to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not speaking of the original bill. What the Chair is asking the gentleman is whether he interprets the Glass amendment and the Goldsborough amendment as the Chair interprets it. The Glass amendment has for its purpose increasing the circulating medium in this country. The Goldsborough proposition has that exact purpose. One is a method that is sought to be, and I think the facts would show it to be a probable opportunity of expanding the currency to the extent of some $900,000,000. That is the Glass proposition. There is no limit, so far as the Chair knows, to expanding the currency under the Goldsborough bill. Both of them have the same purpose. The Chair can not see why one is not germane to the other.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But they are upon absolutely different lines. They are different propositions. The so-called Glass amendment provides for the issuance of national-bank notes to increase the circulating medium. The so-called Goldsborough bill provides for stabilizing or restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar by the purchase and sale of bonds by the Federal reserve banks. Those are two entirely different things. One provides for increasing the circulating medium and the other provides for the purchase and sale of bonds to maintain, on a certain level, the purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The result of the purchase of bonds is the issuance of Federal reserve notes, which is currency. So that is the purpose of it. In one case the member banks issue the currency. That is the Glass bill. In the case of the Goldsborough bill the Federal reserve banks issue the currency. That is the only difference.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The answer to that is that the Glass amendment concerns itself entirely with the banking act of 1882 and the Goldsborough bill relates to the Federal reserve system, but they are along two different lines. They are for entirely different purposes. One is for the purpose of increasing the circulating medium and the other, distinctly upon its face, is for the purpose of restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar. There may incidentally be the same result of both of those operations, but it is not for the Chair, I submit, to speculate as to what may be the effect of one bill or the other.

The question is whether the two propositions are separate and distinct, so that the one has no relation to the other. I say they are so separate and distinct that the one has no relation to the other, and the proof historically is that the House passed the one bill and the Senate passed the other bill, and now the gentleman who offers this amendment proposes to pass both bills in one measure as an amendment to an entirely different bill.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. I want to make myself clear. I think perhaps the Chair remembers that I had some relation to the Goldsborough bill, and I spoke perhaps with some understanding of the matter when it was before the House. The Goldsborough bill was intended to operate through changing the volume of credit.

The Glass-Borah bill is meant to change the volume of money. As I understood it, and I so spoke in its behalf, one was to affect the volume of credit, working through the purchase and sale of acceptances, operations in the open market, ordinary functions which the Federal Reserve Board has been pursuing since its existence, and was intended to instruct the Federal reserve banks to raise the level of prices by affecting the volume of credit, while this bill is to affect the volume of money; and they are two distinct propositions.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has not overlooked one of the words of the Goldsborough bill.

It shall be restored and maintained by control of the volume of credit and currency.

Mr. LUCE. But the currency is deposit currency.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman merely stated "credit" a moment ago.

Mr. LUCE. Currency may be of two kinds; it may be of money or it may be of credit; but the purpose of the Goldsborough bill was to instruct the Federal Reserve Board, by operations in the open market, to raise and lower the volume of what is known as credit currency.

Mr. STEVENSON. "Credit and currency" is the language, and the Glass-Borah proposition is a proposition to issue currency without control. The Goldsborough proposition is to be added to it, which gives the Federal reserve banks the right to control.

If we allow them to issue currency without control, as they are under the Borah amendment to the extent of the United States bonds that are eligible, then there is no control of that volume; and if it becomes too abundant and redundant, then with the Goldsborough bill attached there is power in the Federal Reserve Board to restrict its issues and regulate the amount of currency to the needs of the country; and that makes it entirely and absolutely relevant to the proposition.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. The whole philosophy, theory, and purpose of the Goldsborough bill is to accomplish a rise in the price level of commodities through the enlargement of currency circulation, to be brought about by the issuance of notes by the Federal reserve banks based upon bonds as a substitute for commercial paper, as provided in the Glass-Steagall bill. Is that not true?

And is it not also true that the issuing of currency provided for in the Glass substitute to the Goldsborough bill, now embodied in the home loan bank bill through what is known as the Borah amendment, itself provides that the issuance of currency shall be based upon Government bonds, the same as the Goldsborough bill? Is that not true?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman and I differ. Our dispute is wholly confined to the meaning of the word "currency."

Mr. STEAGALL. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. LUCE. May I complete my statement first?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. LUCE. The Goldsborough bill contemplates the control of deposit currency, not of money currency.

Mr. STEAGALL. Can the gentleman tell me any difference, or can any mind comprehend any difference, in the effect upon commodity prices—assuming that the theory is sound that the enlargement of the circulation will effect an enhancement in commodity prices? Can the gentleman tell me how currency issued under the Goldsborough bill would have any different effect upon commodity prices from currency issued under the provisions of the Glass substitute for the Goldsborough bill?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman is absolutely correct, but one measure contemplates doing this thing in the field of deposit currency, and the other contemplates doing it in the field of money currency.

Mr. STEAGALL. But the argument has been made and the point of order predicated upon the contention that the Goldsborough bill has a different purpose in view—the accomplishment of enhancement in commodity values through enlarged circulation of currency, and I insist there can not be any different effect upon commodity prices by the enlargement of currency under one plan from the enlargement of currency under the other plan.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Under the Glass bill bonds would be put up by the member banks and currency issued.

Mr. LUCE. Money currency.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Well, the gentleman can call it what he pleases. It will be a piece of paper secured by bonds that are put up as collateral. That currency, in one way or another, would get into a bank and would become the basis for credit currency. Exactly the same operation would take place on the issuance of a Federal reserve note. It would go into somebody's hands, but eventually it would get into a bank and become the basis of credit currency. Under our system any kind of currency that is issued ultimately becomes the basis of bank credit. It can not do anything else, because it goes into a bank and becomes a part of the bank reserve. Nothing that could be issued would be currency for any longer than until it got into some bank of deposit.

Mr. LUCE. I have in this pocketbook the same type of money that the gentleman carries in his pocketbook. We are talking about currency that goes from hand to hand, not currency that is disposed of by check.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUH. But when the gentleman goes to a bank this afternoon and makes a deposit, then it ceases to become currency and immediately becomes credit.

Mr. LUCE. But I am not going to the bank. I am going to carry that money in my pocketbook.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to respond to the last question propounded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] because it related to my argument.

I say the purpose of the two amendments is different, for this reason. The so-called Borah amendment provides for an increase in the volume of currency, provides a method by which more money may be issued. The Goldsborough bill provides nothing of the sort. It does not change the law whatever in regard to the issuance of Federal reserve notes, or in regard to the purposes of, or the limitations upon, the issuance of those notes. It simply recites a policy which is construed as achieving the stabilization of commodity prices. In other words, there is nothing in the Goldsborough bill which results in the issuance of any new kind of money or any new amount of money for currency purposes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I may say to the gentleman that in the very extended hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency we were asked time and time again why we wanted this bill passed because of the fact the Federal Reserve Board claimed they were issuing currency anyhow, buying bonds and issuing Federal reserve notes. In other words they admitted at that time that they were doing exactly what they would have to do if the Goldsborough bill were passed, using their own judgment and not the people's judgment as to how far they should go. So, the only thing they could do to raise the price level if this bill were passed would be to increase the currency. When I say currency I mean Federal reserve notes, which have exactly the same effect as any other money, gold, silver, or notes that go into the market.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But the gentleman does not claim the Goldsborough bill contains any provision whatever for enlarging the possibilities for the issuance of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Why, of course, we all know the price level is not up to the price level of 1921 and 1929, and we all know the only way the Federal reserve system could raise the price level would be to go into the market and buy acceptances, notes, or Government bonds, and representatives of the Federal reserve system said in the hearings that if this bill were passed, that what they would have to do would be to pursue the policy they were pursuing, but to pursue it faster.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But before the passage of the Goldsborough bill, and without the passage of the Goldsborough bill, the Federal reserve system could issue just as much money, just as large an amount of Federal reserve notes, as it would be able to issue after the passage of the Goldsborough bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Absolutely not without being guilty of malfeasance in office.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman says they have acted without authority. They now have the legal authority.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. No; they have been doing it without authority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers, if possible, to have the argument directed to the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the Speaker or of the House unnecessarily, and judging from the comment which the Speaker made, I am afraid he has made up his mind, but I would like to supplement, for a moment, the arguments which have been made on this point of order by citing some authorities.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be pleased to hear them.

Mr. MAPES. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the question before the Speaker to decide, reduced to its simplest terms, is whether the Goldsborough bill is germane as an amendment to the Glass bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the sole point of order involved, although the gentleman from Massachusetts and some other gentlemen argued upon the point that it was a customary rule of the House that the House should not be taken by surprise.

Mr. MAPES. That is undoubtedly an incidental consideration, but I agree entirely with the Speaker that the point for the Chair to decide is whether the Goldsborough bill is germane as an amendment to the Glass bill.

The matter before the House for consideration is amendment No. 46 to the home loan bank bill. Amendment 46 is the so-called Glass bill.

Section 777 of the Rules of the House provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment." Under this rule there is this holding:

> In the consideration of Senate amendments to a House bill an amendment must be germane to the particular Senate amendment to which it is offered, it not being sufficient that it should be germane to provisions of the bill.

The Speaker and I are agreed upon the point at issue. The question is, Is the Goldsborough bill germane as an amendment to the Glass bill?

In the report of the conferees on the home-loan bank bill, speaking with reference to amendment No. 46, this language is used:

> This amendment authorizes United States bonds bearing interest at a rate not in excess of 3⅜ per cent to bear the circulating privilege for a period of three years after the enactment of this act. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The committee of conference have not agreed on this amendment.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the interpretation which the House conferees put upon amendment No. 46, the Glass bill. The conferees without any reference to this point of order said that amendment No. 46 had only one purpose in view, namely, to authorize—

United States bonds bearing interest at a rate not in excess of 3⅜ per cent to bear the circulating privilege for a period of three years after the enactment of this act.

I do not want to get into an argument on the money question with the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, but it seems to me the sole purpose of the Glass bill is to make certain United States bonds security for the issuance of national-bank notes. That is the only purpose of the Glass bill, and the Goldsborough bill in no way refers to national-bank notes, nor to any security for the issuance of such notes. The Goldsborough bill is so short that I would like to read it in this connection:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency.

And makes it the duty of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury to make that policy effective.

Nothing is said about furnishing any additional type of security for the purpose of issuing more national-bank notes, and, as I understood it, the issuance of more national-bank notes was not contemplated by the Goldsborough bill at all. It was not mentioned in the debate on the bill on the floor of the House nor anywhere else.

It is unnecessary to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the precedents of the House for a great many years have been to the effect that even though separate propositions attempt to accomplish the same general result they are not germane to each other if they attempt to accomplish that result by entirely different methods.

We had before us at different times during the last few years, as the Speaker well knows, the farm-relief legislation. I think the first decision on that legislation establishing the principle for which I am now contending was handed down by former Member Sanders, of Indiana, as chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. He expressly laid down the rule that amendments had to be related in order to be germane. It was held, for example, that the debenture plan of farm relief was not germane to a bill containing the equalization-fee plan, nor the Federal Farm Board plan to the equalization-fee plan. Unless the Speaker can find that these two methods of improving the present economic conditions, if you want to speak of the matter in that way, are related to each other, it seems to me he must hold with the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this point of order. It seems to me it takes a great deal of construction and a great deal of imagination to hold that the Goldsborough bill is at all germane to the Glass bill, or that it attempts to accomplish the purpose desired by the same general method.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in considering the germaneness of the proposed amendment we are not controlled by what are the purposes of the two proposals nor whether they have the same purpose. We are concerned merely with the manner in which that purpose is to be carried out. We are not concerned with what is to be the product but with the parliamentary machinery by which it is to be produced.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any authority for that?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the Speaker hear me a little further before he calls for authority?

May I point out in just a word or two that these two proposals have no relation to each other? The Borah amendment is, in substance, an amendment to the act of July 12, 1882. The Goldsborough bill is an amendment to the Federal reserve act.

The Borah amendment relates to the issuance of national bank notes. It provides a means whereby national banking associations may obtain notes from the Treasury. That is all it does provide.

The Goldsborough bill undertakes first to establish a governmental policy relating to prices of commodities, having nothing whatever to do with the issuance of national-bank notes. Its secondary purpose is to give instructions to the Federal Reserve Board and to the Secretary of the Treasury in carrying out that policy.

One proposal relates to public policy as affecting prices, the other relates exclusively to terms under which national bank notes may be issued by the Treasury. The two are not related in even the remotest degree. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. Wherever an amendment has for its purpose the accomplishment of the same results, it is germane. However different the language may be, if its ultimate object results in the same purpose, undoubtedly it is germane.

The Chair believes that the so-called Goldsborough amendment—and he has read the debate on it—had for its purpose the increasing not only of the credit but of the currency of the country. The Members voted on it with that understanding. The Glass proposal undoubtedly has for its purpose the extension of the national-bank note currency so far as the banks desire to use bonds for that purpose. So both of these propositions have for their purpose the expansion of the currency of the United States and making it less valuable in comparison with commodity prices.

In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that the rule ought to be—and the Chair believes it ought to be as far as it can be enforced—that the House should not be surprised, and therefore no amendment ought to be considered on a wholly new subject matter, the Chair will state that that happens not to be the case in this instance. The House did discuss the Goldsborough amendment, but it has never had a chance to discuss the Glass amendment. It did vote on the Goldsborough amendment and voted 289 to 60 in favor of the Goldsborough amendment. In the opinion of the Chair, it can not be said that after the House so overwhelmingly voted in favor of the Goldsborough amendment—as the Chair stated, 289 for the amendment and only 60 against it—the House is taken by surprise.

The Chair believes that they both have the same purpose, and although the Glass amendment would not have been in order to this bill originally in the House, having been put on in the Senate in violation of the House rules, under our rules we are compelled to consider the Senate amendment and therefore an amendment to the Senate amendment which does not violate the rules of the House is germane, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Alabama going to yield so that we can discuss this matter on both sides?

Mr. STEAGALL. I expect to yield and to divide the one hour of time as best I may, and so far as I am concerned, if it does not interfere with the business of the day, I will be pleased to request that the time be extended 30 minutes, after which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this motion be for one hour and a half, to be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and at the end of the debate, the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have decided to ask for a division of the motion. Would that have to be agreed upon now or could that be done after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand just what the gentleman from New York wants to divide.

Mr. SNELL. The motion made by the gentleman from Alabama is to recede and concur with an amendment, and we want to divide that question.

The SPEAKER. The Parliamentarian informs the Chair that the motion to recede and concur is divisible.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I asked, and I would like to have it understood now that we want to do that. The question is whether we would have to do it now or can we make the request after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I believe the Speaker has not grasped the purport of the request from the gentleman from New York. The gentleman asked for a division of the pending motion, two propositions being involved, one the Borah amendment and the other the Goldsborough amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is not what the gentleman from New York asked.

Mr. SNELL. Yes. If I did not make myself clear, I ask that the motion be divided and that we vote on receding and also on concurring, with an amendment. I want a vote on receding and also a vote on concurring with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have that, the Parliamentarian advises the Chair, and the Chair is inclined to think he is right about it.

Mr. SNELL. If we agree to the previous question, can that be done after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. The division will be made now, so that ordering the previous question will not deprive the gentleman of any of his rights.

Is there objection to extending the time of debate to one hour and a half, after which the previous question shall be considered as ordered?

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the home loan bill have reached an agreement on everything except what is known as the Borah amendment. This amendment embodies the same provisions as the measure reported to the Senate as a substitute for the Goldsborough bill which passed the House. The Borah amendment authorizes national banks to issue currency based upon United States bonds bearing interest not in excess of 3⅜ per cent for a period of three years. It is estimated that this would result in the issue of about $800,000,000 of bank notes. The Goldsborough bill declares it to be the policy of the Government that the Federal reserve banks shall use their powers through the expansion of currency and credit to restore a normal commodity price level. The Federal Reserve Board under this bill would have complete control of the increase in circulation and power to reverse the policy if necessary to stabilize commodity prices. The country is suffering from contraction of currency and a complete breakdown of credit. It is true Federal reserve banks have emitted notes to the amount of $1,000,000,000 and more. But we are advised that one and one-half billion dollars are being hoarded, and more than a billion dollars in gold have been withdrawn. So we see there has been a large curtailment of circulation. It is agreed on all hands that the contraction of currency and credit can only result in depression of prices and curtailment of commerce and business. The House conferees sought to amend the Borah provision by incorporating the substance of the Goldsborough bill.

The conferees on the part of the House have simply attempted in good faith to represent and maintain the will and desire of the House as expressed in the passage of the Goldsborough bill by record vote, 289 to 60. [Applause.]

We have kept faith with the House and I am sure our purpose will be appreciated by the House. Mr. Speaker, I have voted for the measures that have been proposed by the administration in the effort to find relief from the horrible conditions under which the country suffers at this time. No man can charge that the committee of which I have the honor to serve as chairman has been guided by any partisan considerations or that we have not whole-heartedly supported and upheld every suggestion and every undertaking put forth by the administration and its leadership looking toward alleviation of the suffering and distress that exist as a result of economic conditions.

This conference was not actuated, so far as we are concerned who are here dissenting from the amendments incorporated by the Senate, by any partisan consideration, and I want to say to the gentlemen on the minority side that the conferees on the part of the House acted without consulting anybody. It can not be said that the vice presidential candidate had anything to do with the differences which sprang up in the conference on this bill yesterday. We did not consult him in advance, and we did not consult him while we were in session. We did not consult anybody. But fairness compels me to make the statement that these differences would not have existed, and this disagreement would not have been reported to the House, if gentlemen who represent the majority in the Senate in this conference had pursued the same course that we did. Some of them were busy at the telephone a good deal of the time the conference was engaged in the consideration of this bill, and the plain fact is that our failure to agree was the result of a telephone conversation and a suggestion that Executive disapproval would be forthcoming if the Republican conferees themselves voted their own judgment on the propositions in dispute.

That is why we disagreed. That is a fair statement of the history of the conference in that regard. I shall not yield to the temptation to go farther into details.

Mr. Speaker, the things we have done during the present session, the legislation we have passed to bring relief to the country have failed of their purpose. I want to say here and now that I have never made the statement on this floor in regard to any measure that came out of the committee of which I serve as chairman that any of these bills would bring the relief we hoped for and so much desired.

These measures are palliatives; they are narcotics; they simply postpone the day of judgment.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has saved some banks from failure, but at enormous cost. To furnish funds to take care of the withdrawal of deposits in banks is a stupendous undertaking. But it would not be so difficult to protect depositors in banks from final losses in cases of bank failures.

The corporation saved one bank in Chicago a few days ago, but in order to do it they had to pledge the funds of the corporation to the extent of $80,000,000. That was necessary to prevent a breakdown of the economic situation in the city of Chicago.

I remind this House that some of us have labored for a simple, common-sense, inexpensive method of saving our banks. The plan is to apply to bank deposits the principle of insurance, a principle universally approved and practiced in economic affairs throughout the civilized world. We have sought to establish plans to have the banks themselves carry the burden and set up an insurance fund for the protection of depositors. This would relieve banks of the constant fear of runs. No solvent bank would be in such danger. But we were not allowed to do it. Instead we are having the Treasury make loans to banks to provide funds to meet withdrawals.

I remind the House that the loan made to one bank in the city of Chicago of $80,000,000 was a sum in round numbers sufficient to pay all the net losses to depositors in national banks in this country from the foundation of the system in 1865 down to 1930, and that is the testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

It would be a trivial thing comparatively to set up an insurance fund and let the depositors know that their deposits are safe; that they do not have to take their money home, bury it, or sleep with it, in order to make it safe. Such a situation is a stigma upon the banking system of the United States and upon the financial leadership of the Nation.

Now, they are asking Congress to supplement the funds that we have set up for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation involving the Treasury to the amount of three and one-half billion dollars. Bank failures are continuing at an alarming rate, and they will continue. When we set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with its billions supplied by the Treasury, we confessed ourselves bankrupt in leadership before God and the world.

I supported the bill, but no man can boast of leadership in financial affairs or of any contribution to relief from economic distress when he has to resort to the Treasury and put his hand in the pockets of the taxpayers of the whole Nation. [Applause.]

Give me access to the Treasury of the United States and I will put J. P. Morgan to shame as a financier—if he will take his hands out. [Laughter and applause.]

We have no right to boast. On the contrary we stand discredited before the world until we afford the American people a leadership that will find relief from financial distress, without leading into the doors of the people's Treasury. [Applause.]

That is the only remedy we have found, as expressed in final enactment of legislation by this Congress. The only measures that would bring relief in a normal way have been passed by the House only to sleep at the other end of the Capitol until the hour of adjournment is at hand.

There is but one way by which we may ever dig our way out of the burdens of debt that press down upon us. That is by raising the price level of commodities—the products of the farms and factories in this country. Everybody says so; nobody any longer disputes it. You do not have to have an expert come and look wise to tell you that. Everyone from the head of the Government down to the properietor of the lowliest bootblack stand has found out that that is where the trouble is—wheat farmers can not pay debts or consume their share of the necesaries of life at present prices for wheat. People can not pay their debts contracted at 20-cent cotton with cotton down to 5 cents. It went down to $4.80 a few days ago on the board in New York. Talk about honest money! Talk about sound money! Of course, all good citizens want sound money. They want our money respected at home and abroad. But they want money that is honest for debtors as well as creditors. There is nothing more terrible, there is nothing more indefensible, there is nothing more dishonest than to compel a man to produce 4 bales of cotton to pay a debt for which he contracted to pay 1. [Applause.] If anyone has any remedy for this better than the bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee and passed by the House, the measure which we now offer along with the Borah amendment, I say bring it out and I shall vote for it and work for it if I have to stay here and keep at work until I drop in my tracks. Only two things have been offered here that offer promise of relief. Oh, we may save a few homes, Brother REILLY, and you rendered valiant service in that direction. I appreciate the hard work and splendid service rendered by the gentleman from Wisconsin in connection with this bill. I fear its relief as in the case of the aid to Federal land banks will not reach those for whom it is intended as we desire. I am talking about our difficulties in their broader aspects. We have not touched a real solution. There have been only two bills that justify hope of substantial success—the currency expansion and bank deposit protection bills. I do not know that they would do the work. I am not an expert. If I were, I would not have the face to look at you, because the big financiers and experts and leaders in the financial world are so discredited that I thank God I do not belong to their class. [Applause.]

We need a little common sense. We need a little patriotism and love of country instead of selfish love of dividends and dollars. [Applause.] We are not going to find our way out under our present leadership. This leadership does not even pretend to offer any remedy. These leaders tell the people to wait, to sit still, and trust to luck. They say that this depression is an accident, that it is providential, that it is the result of the World War. It is not an accident. It is not providential. It is not due to the war. France is on her feet financially. The sun in the heavens and the moon and the stars operate under immutable law. You sit where you are under immutable law. All the universe and the multipled worlds that float through space are held together under immutable law. It is cause and effect wherever you turn; and this panic, this depression, is an instance of cause and effect. I want to repudiate here and now any part of responsibility for a leadership that treats our afflictions as accidental. I repudiate here and now any part in a leadership that attempts to treat industrious labor, a fruitful soil, happy seasons, and bountiful harvests as curses to mankind. [Applause.] It is mockery; it is worse than mockery—it is little less than blasphemy—to treat these beneficent results of Divine Providence as curses. Yet we have a leadership that says to my farmers and to yours—at least they told them so last year, and if they are consistent and sincere they will tell them again this year—to go back and find employment by plowing up a part of the crop produced by their labor and the sweat and toil of their women and children. [Applause.] It is false; it is ridiculous; it is idiotic; and the average man or woman in this country understands that it is—that it is not true; that it is not put out by people who think, but by people who read something somewhere and repeat it without thinking. Thinking could not lead to such a conclusion.

There never has been overproduction of anything that is good and useful for human kind. God Almighty does not do things in a foolhardy way. There is not a drop of water in the ocean or a leaf in the forest that was not put there by His all-wise hands for our good and for His glory, if only we will have the common sense and the patriotism to appropriate those things, each man receiving according to his contribution in human toil to the production of things that make for human happiness. If this other doctrine were true, then an anarchist would be a good citizen and a farmer who works and toils and sacrifices and saves would be an undesirable citizen. No; it is not so; and let me say this: I have some little official responsibility, though not a great deal. My people have been very good to me, and not very exacting. But the people of this country have a right to demand and exact a high standard of public service at a time like this on the part of men who are called to serve in high places. I feel my responsibility, and I say this in all kindliness, and not in partisanship. Our partisan controversies will work out all right. I am not disturbed about that. I am quite content with developments and indications in that connection. No administration, no Member of Congress, has any right to ask that he be permitted to serve in office at a time like this unless he has some purpose and some plan to bring relief to the people of this country. [Applause.] Common honesty and true patriotism demand of you and me and of the Speaker in that chair, and of any other official, high or low, in this Government, from the President down, that unless he has some plan by which to aid the people of the Nation and to bring relief from the distress that exists and the dangers that threaten the country in this hour, he owes the duty to get out of office and let somebody take his place who will at least undertake to find relief.

Two measures have been offered and passed by the House that have met popular approval. One is the Goldsborough bill. It is a conservative bill; it is constructive. It merely tells the Federal Reserve Board that it is the policy of the Government that they shall use their powers in open-market operations in a way to release currency and expand credits in order that our people may sell the products of their toil at prices that will enable them to pay their debts and save their homes and save this Republic with all it means to us and to the world. [Applause.]

An industrious, law-abiding people who work and produce an abundance of the things essential to human happiness are entitled to fair rewards and a reasonable measure of prosperity.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman tell us how the Federal reserve will do that?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Federal reserve has the power. They say so. Every member of the board says so. They have the power to bring some measure of relief by emitting bills and by putting more money in circulation. The Glass bill has a provision looking to that end, but the Senate would not consider the bill we passed. They sent a substitute in the bill before us, and it would have been just as properly attached to a treaty with some foreign power as to attach it to the home loan bank bill that this House passed. We want to maintain the dignity of this House and the integrity of its position by keeping that bill in this measure and sending it to the Senate and letting them vote on it.

The other bill to which I referred would require the banks of this country to apply the principle which they apply in their transactions with their customers, with their own officials and with themselves, the principle of insurance that is applied in the economic affairs of the world, so that citizens may have a place where they may deposit their money and where that money may perform its proper function in the economic and commercial life of the Nation. When we pass these two measures we shall begin to see the light breaking. They at least offer hope. The other leadership has failed. It simply leads us nowhere, and the people of this country are not content with it. They are going to repudiate it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I must beg pardon for trespassing upon the time of the House. I wanted the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], who has rendered such signal service during this session and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY], the author of the home loan bank bill, to say something on this measure.

I ask unanimous consent that we have 30 minutes additional time for debate, in order that these gentlemen may be heard. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object if the discussion will be confined to the bill and not have the extra time taken up in making political speeches on questions not related to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object unless the request is amended that the additional debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will amend my request by stating that the debate shall relate to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SCHAFER. As modified?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As modified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the rules of the House, the discussion must be confined to the subject matter. It is a ridiculous proposal to have that suggested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the understanding of the Chair. We will proceed accordingly. There being no objection, the time is extended 30 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield one-half of the time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]—45 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is the home loan bank bill. The conference report this morning agreed on all of the amendments on the home loan bank bill. We disagreed on amendment No. 46, on page 41 of the bill. This proposal has nothing whatever to do with the home loan bank bill. I have not been in sympathy with the passage of legislation like the home loan bank bill, but I say to the friends of the home loan bank bill that their bill is at stake here to-day; and unless you vote down both of these proposals, in my judgment, you will not have any home loan bank bill.

I will be perfectly plain. I may be violating some of the rules of the conference, but if I am, I alone will suffer by that criticism.

We were told in the conference that the President of the United States would not sign this bill if the Goldsborough amendment were added to it, and I want the friends of the home loan bank bill to understand that when you vote in support of the Goldsborough amendment you are not helping that amendment by voting for it twice. It has once passed the House, and I know the majority of the House is for it, but the Senate is against that amendment. What kind of maneuvering took place at the other end of the Capitol in order to defeat it? Senator GLASS proposed and had accepted in the Senate committee this amendment No. 46, section 29 of this bill, which provides for the legalizing, for circulating privileges, "for the issuance of national-bank currency," $1,000,000,000 or more of United States bonds. Senator GLASS, when he proposed that, as disclosed by the debates on the floor of the Senate, and any of you who look at it will find it, said that the proposition was unsound, and that he was only presenting it for the purpose of defeating the Goldsborough bill, which it did defeat. The Goldsborough bill stopped right there in the Senate, and there it lies right now. If by any act of this House to-day it is put into this bill, you have notice in advance that the home loan bank bill will not be signed. I am not asking you to take my word as regards section 29 of this bill. It will not do that which the people who want this amendment claim that it will do.

Let me follow it a little further. It has Senator BORAH's name attached to it. If you will watch the Senate proceedings on the floor of the Senate you will notice that Senator BORAH took up this proposition of Senator GLASS originally for the purpose of defeating the beer bill provision that the Senate had placed in the home loan bank bill. That it would appear was the Senator's interest in this particular piece of legislation.

If there ever was a ridiculous proposal made it is this section 29. I know there is a vast sentiment throughout this country that we should increase the circulating medium, that currency should be increased, and that it will help stabilize and raise price levels. Permit me to tell you that the passage of section 29 will not increase the circulating medium one cent.

I will tell you why. This qualifies those classes of outstanding Government bonds bearing interest at 3⅜ per cent or under. Most of the little banks of the country—and they are the ones most of us here are thinking about—have now outstanding their full quota of circulating medium.

It was stated to the conferees last evening that an examination disclosed the fact that this particular class of bonds mentioned here are not at the present held by the small banks. There is a question as to where they are held. It may be that a lot of them are held abroad. They may be held by the big city banks. So if any of these small banks want to increase their circulating medium what have they got to do? They have got to go into the market to buy bonds. They have got to borrow money. Then when they get these notes they are going to use the national-bank currency notes they get to take up the money they borrowed to buy the bonds.

This circulating medium in the form of national-bank notes will go into the Federal reserve banks, and it will increase credit on the books of the Federal reserve banks. There is a surplus of this kind of credit to-day in the Federal reserve banks. There is not any question about that.

I am just wondering what the maneuver is here in this situation. If there is any good here anywhere it might possibly be in increasing the value of the Government bonds, but this is a doubtful expedient at this time, and I think it is very questionable whether we should do the thing that is already in existence to-day, establish speculation in Government bonds. That is what is taking place.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that the President has announced he will veto the home loan bank bill with the Goldsborough amendment. Was any announcement made as to what he would do with the bill with the Glass amendment?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not know that it was stated. I think it was said by one of the conferees that he did not want it. I have understood the Federal Reserve Board does not want that provision in the bill.

I think I have shown exactly how it will work if this amendment should be adopted, but I want to point out more clearly what is going to happen.

The 2 per cent bonds that are now back of the issuance of the national bank currency which are held by banks all over the country are at a fictitious price because they carry with them the circulation privilege. Now, you are authorizing the circulation privilege to be extended to all bonds drawing interest under 3¾ per cent.

Mr. CELLER. Is it 3¾ per cent or 3⅜ per cent?

Mr. McFADDEN. Three and three-eighths per cent or under. By this amendment you have disturbed the market, because before I came to the House to-day I called up to see what the market is on 2 per cent bonds that are now held by these banks, and I was told by the best authority I could call that there were no offers on 2 per cent bonds to-day. You are going to depreciate the value of the 2 per cent bonds that are now held by the banks all over the country. The depreciation in some instances will cause a depletion in the capital of the banks that will cost the banks real dollars. You are going to put a fictitious value on these bonds that bear 3⅜ per cent interest and under.

It is said here as an argument for this proposition that there is a 3-year limitation, but there is no provision that says what is going to happen at the end of the three years. These little banks are going to decide for themselves what they had better do. A lot of banks right now are selling their 2 per cent bonds in fear that this bill may pass, and these bonds are going to be a drug on the market as indicated by the market this morning. The other bonds have gone up already, and the little country banks will have to buy bonds bearing the higher rate of interest and pay the present bonds a higher price for the 3⅜ bonds to the banks in the cities who have been accumulating them to make this profit. They will have to buy after some one has made the profit that will be made in the next few days after the passage of this act.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Can the gentleman tell the House, without violating any confidence of the conference, what the attitude of the American Bankers' Association is toward this legislation that is now pending before the House?

Mr. McFADDEN. I understand they are all against it, but I am not speaking for the American Bankers' Association.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, any other association of bankers.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am speaking to preserve a situation in this country that is going to become disastrous to the small banks if this bill passes. This is a ridiculous proposition and will do the banks more harm than good.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The amount which banks have invested in those 2 per cents is practically the amount of the present circulation, or about $700,000,000, is it not?

Mr. McFADDEN. A little over $700,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. A depreciation of 20 per cent, or $140,000,000, would very materially impair the capital of these banks.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say that the gentleman from South Carolina and myself are entirely in agreement on this proposition. I think I am quoting him correctly when I say that this loss will come principally from the small national banks throughout the country.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask this further question. The present parliamentary situation is confusing me. If this House should refuse to concur with an amendment but should concur in the Borah amendment it will become law, because the Senate has already put it in.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. We need to be careful about it, because it is a very dangerous proposition.

Mr. McFADDEN. When you gentlemen vote to-day to concur in section 29 or amendment 46, which I am asking you not to, you are voting this provision into the law.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman said that most of the money for the purchase of these bonds would go into the Federal reserve system. Is that because it has most of the bonds, through its open-market transactions, which would have the circulation medium privilege under the Glass amendment?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman it comes about in this way: These country banks which have the 2 per cent bonds now but do not have these other bonds will have to borrow money if they want to buy more bonds to increase their circulating notes in order to get them or else use their general assets which may not be free. They will have to go into the market and buy the bonds and then later they will have to repay their obligations to the Federal reserve banks from which they borrowed the money to buy the bonds. These notes, then, would go back to establish a credit in the Federal reserve. I want to point out to you that I know that it is the desire of many to increase our circulating medium, but this is not the way to do it. This money is going into the Federal reserve banks, and let me tell you that a credit of $1,000,000,000, no matter how it is established, in the Federal reserve banks can, under certain conditions, be expanded twenty times. Now, there is no need for that kind of an expansion in the Federal reserve at this time. What we need is the money to go out of the member banks. It should be poured out into industry.

While I am on this particular subject let me say that the proposed relief bill which we will vote on to-day contains a provision which is particularly dangerous to the Federal reserve system, and that is the provision in the bill which goes to the very fundamentals of the Federal reserve system, the provision which authorizes corporations and individuals to borrow directly from the Federal reserve banks. Why, gentlemen, that would destroy the Federal reserve system. I wonder what we are doing. What are we thinking about here with important legislation like this, with only a half hour's time to discuss it, in a trying situation like this? I can not understand what people who are responsible for these proposals are thinking about.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is there any difference in principle between the issue under this bill and the issue under the Owen bill for the payment of the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. McFADDEN. It is practically the same thing.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the provision with reference to direct loans is in the relief bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. As I understand, it is an amendment that was placed on the bill in the Senate, the relief bill that is now in conference.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have in mind that there was a proposal at one time to give corporations and individuals the privilege of borrowing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Is there any difference fundamentally in putting it in the bill as applied to the Federal reserve banks and as applied to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. McFADDEN. If you are going to do it you would a great deal better do it through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because under the present proposal you are going to destroy the Federal reserve if it is put into operation. I know the great desire and need for improving the price level of farm commodities, and of this, that, and the other. The gentleman from Alabama said we were dealing with causes and effects. Of course we are. However, we are not dealing with causes but we are dealing with effects in all this class of legislation.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, that which I have tried to tell you on various other occasions, that the root of this whole trouble is the policy and management of your Federal reserve system. It is a deflationary policy. In spite of all beliefs and in spite of what you are reading in the papers in regard to inflation, the purchase of Government bonds under pressure to the extent of a billion dollars was to offset the gold that was shipped out of this country. From my study of this situation and from my information we are still operating under a deflationary policy. We are still pursuing it. For the past week the deflation in the loans of the member banks of the Federal reserve system was 1⅕ per cent. That is the report of the Federal Reserve Board and that is the deflation for the past week. For the past four months, since the enactment of the Glass-Steagall bill, the deflation has been 12 per cent, a deflation at the rate of 3 per cent each month, for the past year a deflation of 24 per cent and for the past two years a deflation in these loans of 34 per cent.

In the face of a policy of this kind, how can you expect a return to normal prices in the United States? I want to repeat, as forcefully as I can, that the trouble in this whole situation is the policy and the management of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. What would the gentleman suggest as an inflationary measure?

Mr. McFADDEN. A change of policy in the management of the Federal reserve system, and you can not have any change so long as you have the present management.

Just a word in regard to the Goldsborough bill. I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose that is sought to be accomplished by that bill, but you can not get around the present management of the Federal reserve system. They will do as they please when you pass the Goldsborough bill and you will not know whether they are following the instructions of that law or not. They are a law unto themselves, and in the management of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation you have perpetuated this same control over the operations of that corporation, and I venture to say that my good friend, Judge SUMNERS of Texas, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will agree with me when I state that the reconstruction finance measure is not constitutional, and that the operations of the Federal reserve, as they have been carried on for the past two years, are illegal.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman explain what difference, if any, exists between the Glass-Steagall bill relative to the issuance of Federal reserve currency by the Federal reserve system, and its privileges under the present Glass bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Under the Goldsborough bill he is dealing with Federal reserve operations and in directing the management of the Federal reserve system to give due consideration to the equalization of price levels, of course, is embodied to a certain extent, so far as their authority goes, the regulation of the issuance of Federal reserve notes, and the release of credit through the Federal reserve system.

This provision of the Glass-Borah bill is an amendment of the national banking act and applies to the issuance of national-bank currency. When these notes are issued, of course, they go into the Federal reserve system through the issuing banks directly and indirectly to establish credit in the Federal reserve, and they are just like any other money that goes in there—they establish a credit after they are once in the Federal reserve. There is a vast difference when credit is established in the Federal reserve as to whether you take it out in the form of Federal reserve notes or whether you take credit on the books of a Federal reserve bank. I would like to have you distinguish between the two, because in several speeches I have made on the floor of this House during this session, I have pointed out the great abuse of this credit that is thus established by the Federal reserve, and the large amounts which have been used by foreign countries to finance operations between other foreign countries and to also finance our industrial competitors in trade with the United States.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. Assuming they will take credit on the books of the Federal reserve bank, how much more money would that put in circulation, and what effect would that have on increasing the circulating medium so far as paper money is concerned?

Mr. McFADDEN. You can only keep out so much circulating medium. There is no shortage of circulating medium to-day—if you have a check or credit, any bank will give you the cash. When it is not required, it automatically retires itself. The mere authorization of the issuance of currency, as proposed in this bill, will not increase the circulating medium one dollar.

Mr. MOUSER. That is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. McFADDEN. Do not be deceived. Vote against both of these proposals, and when I say this I am speaking for those who are in favor of the home-loan bank. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, friends of the home loan bank bill will vote down both the proposed amendment and the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has made clear that the Borah amendment is foreign entirely to the purpose of the home loan bank bill. It was injected into it for one purpose, and that was an ulterior purpose.

All those who have followed the proceedings in the other body know that there are a large number who were primarily opposed to the fundamental principle of the home loan bank bill, and to adopt these amendments now would jeopardize the very life of the bill by injecting a foreign question, with the direct purpose on the part of enemies of the measure to defeat it.

We have voted on the Goldsborough bill overwhelmingly in favor. I spoke against it. I was not in sympathy with the idea of inflation that is involved in that bill. I am not in sympathy with the minor inflationary proposal of the Borah amendment; and I say to the Members of the House that if they are truly and sincerely in favor of the home loan bank bill, then vote consistently against both of these foreign, extraneous proposals.

We should not inject into this bill now the consideration of something that is going to jeopardize the principle of granting to the owners of homes, who have mortgages on them, the privilege of getting some relief from a system that is similar to the Federal reserve system.

Why should the gentleman from Maryland, just from pride of authorship, try to defeat a proposal which will give some relief to the home owners of the country by injecting the Goldsborough proposal because he thinks it will bring some relief to the country generally? [Applause.] The sincere supporters of the original bill will vote down the Senate amendment and refuse to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. If we do that, then there is hope that we will get away from this torrid atmosphere not only in the House but outside of the House in 24 hours. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am in absolute agreement with the remarks of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] when he urges that the pending amendment be rejected by the House.

However, I am sure he did not intend to inject a partisan note when he referred to the Goldsborough bill and stated that it was the desire of the author to have incorporated into this bill his theory as expressed in the bill that passed this House a few months ago.

Our present legislative condition is due to the Borah amendment adopted in the Senate, whereby, as a rider, a currency expansion bill was added to the home loan bank bill.

The situation here to-day unfortunately emanated in the other branch and the responsibility, if this bill fails to pass, is and should be definitely fixed in and placed upon that body.

I am absolutely in accord with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and other gentlemen on both sides of the aisle, who feel that we ought to pass the home loan bank bill, and that we should not permit the bill to be used as a means of inflation or expansion of the currency of the country.

Furthermore, let me convey this thought to those Members who voted against the bonus bill: I voted for it because I felt that a reasonable expansion of the currency was justifiable and that the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates was the most effective way to put an expansion of currency into successful operation. But how can any man who voted against the bonus bill vote for this bill? If you do, you are voting for the same principle that was involved in the Patman bill. The principle of the expansion of the currency is involved in the Borah amendment and in the amendment offered by my distinguished friend [Mr. STEAGALL], and if you vote for this you are simply stating that you did not believe in an expansion for the soldier but that you do believe in expansion provided for in this rider on the home loan bank bill for certain banking interests who will benefit by the Borah amendment.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The soldiers' bonus would have distributed the money in all parts of the country.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman spoke of the Senators putting on the Glass bill as an amendment to this bill. We in this House have the responsibility now, and that responsibility is ours.

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly we have our responsibility, and I am assuming mine by opposing the pending amendment, and I hope that this branch will reject any effort to place into this bill a provision for the expansion of the currency as a rider on this most important and meritorious legislation.

The people of the country want the passage of a home loan bank bill. I want it, and practically every Member of the House wants it. Let us pass such a bill. [Applause.] Do not let us stand for the insertion of riders by the other branch into any bills that we pass, which are not germane. We passed a $125,000,000 home loan bank bill, and when it comes back from the other branch there is an expansion of the currency rider attached to that meritorious piece of legislation involving $1,000,000,000. I hope this branch will reject the recommendation of the House conferees on the amendment which is pending; reject the amendment put in the bill in the Senate, and pass the home loan bank bill and send it to the President and let him sign it, thereby putting it into operation. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself briefly to the practical situation. At the opening of the session the President recommended as part of his financial program for relieving the financial distress of the country the passage of a home loan bank bill. This measure has been in preparation and process of enactment for more than six months. The first question before us now, the prime question, the great question, is whether this House will or will not permit the enactment of a home loan bank bill. For purposes that I have no desire to criticize, because I address myself to the practical phase of the situation, there has come an attempt to attach to this bill two other proposals. A difficult technical situation confronts the House. Unless it is understood, the voting may not always be intelligent. I am not going into the philosophy of the questions involved or to argue their merits, but I shall try to help gentlemen who will be good enough to listen to me.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. LAMNECK. I am simply trying to make the gentleman 4 or 5 votes.

Mr. LUCE. I know the gentleman would be doing that, and I wish he could get me more, but perhaps the voting will be more likely to go my way if the questions immediately confronting us are understood, and the parliamentary situation is understood. In the Senate there was attached to this bill what may be called the Glass-Borah bill, by reason of its advocates, which contemplates increasing the volume of money. The Senate is strongly in favor of that proposal. That proposal, if it leaves here, will not meet obstacles anywhere along the road. I do not say that as an argument in its behalf, or as to its merits, but to point out a fact. If no addition is made to that proposal this House will adjourn from three days to a week earlier than would otherwise be the case. I know that is not the highest type of consideration. We all ought to be willing to stay here and swelter if it is in the interest of the public good, but those of us who think the public good will not be subserved by an effort of this sort may at least throw the fact into the scale for what it may be worth.

If you accept this Goldsborough amendment, you have not only invited that calamity but also have invited a renewal of a discussion, largely academic, that will have no practical result in the way of legislation. Already it is quite clear that the other branch does not believe in the instructions that the House would have given to the Federal Reserve Board. I do not retract one word of what I have said in behalf of the economic principle involved, but this principle should not at the moment be put in issue. What gentlemen must choose between is this: Will you go back home and say that you have killed the home loan bank bill for the sake of a manifesto about deposit currency; or will you go home and say, "I bring you a home loan bank bill, believing that the other question will be discussed at a later time when it may be determined by itself and on its own merits"?

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. In the gentleman's opinion, what will be the effect on the possibility of an early passage of this bill if the so-called Glass-Borah amendment is also stricken out? In answering that, also, would the gentleman give us his opinion as to whether or not the purposes of the home loan bank bill are in any way improved or enhanced by this Glass-Borah amendment which is now attached to it?

Mr. LUCE. Its purposes are improved not the slightest. Its possibility of going into action forthwith is somewhat dimmed by the delays inevitable to a discussion of the Glass-Borah bill. Personally, I am at the moment taking no sides for or against the Glass-Borah amendment. I am simply discussing the practical situation.

If, as now seems probable, the request for a division of the question will be withdrawn, then the first vote will come squarely upon the Goldsborough bill. We can vote it up or vote it down. If we vote it up, then the delay and the uncertainty continue, and the great risk to the home loan bank bill continues.

Any man who wants the home loan bank bill, any man who has listened to the voices of hundreds of his constituents, who knows that there are 12,000,000 members of the building and loan associations and 14,000,000 savings-bank depositors, more than a quarter of the adult inhabitants, men and women, of this country, directly or indirectly concerned with the home loan bank bill, will find it somewhat difficult to explain why he placed in advance of that measure the fate of a proposal as to the conduct of the Federal Reserve Board in its relation to prices.

Mr. McCORMACK. The same thing applies to the Glass-Borah amendment. I have listened to the argument of my friend.

I analyzed his mind; I appreciate the message he is conveying, but if we are to pass a home loan bank bill we should not have either the Goldsborough amendment there or the Glass-Borah amendment there. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. I take no issue with the gentleman in that regard, but I am trying to point out how we are going to have an opportunity to kill one rat at a time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman help kill the other one?

Mr. LUCE. I shall vote to kill the other one. [Applause.] But I do not so importantly stress the other as my colleague from Massachusetts, and I shall shed no tears if my vote proves futile.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is proposing to kill the mouse first and let the big rat get away, if he does not watch out.

Mr. LUCE. I rather doubt it. I think the House can handle both of them, but I am sure my chief anxiety is to kill the first one because of my deep concern for the fate of the home loan bank bill.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. How will that be accomplished? Is the gentleman going to vote for the bill as is?

Mr. LUCE. The first vote will come on a motion to recede and concur, together with the Goldsborough amendment. I shall vote "no" on that, and I wish the whole House would vote "no." By doing that we shall have wiped the Goldsborough proposal off the slate. Then the next motion will be simply to recede and concur. If that prevails, in all probability we shall thereby have put into law the Glass-Borah provision. If you do not like the Glass-Borah provision, you will vote to refuse to recede and concur in that amendment. If the motion should, however, prevail, then the business will go back to conference and we shall return with a home loan bank bill such as we started out to get.

Mr. KELLER. Will it not then result naturally and certainly that the Senate will turn down the home loan bank bill?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, there is no likelihood of that. This bill will become a law if we do not load it down with things which I continue to believe, in spite of my respect for the opinion of the Speaker, are not germane to this proposition.

Mr. KELLER. I am afraid the gentleman will murder the bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I understood that at the time the debate started the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] made a parliamentary inquiry of the Speaker whether the motion was divisible and served notice that he would divide it, and it was so ordered. Consequently the first vote, if that is the case, will come on a motion to recede.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield to the gentleman from New York to answer the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is correct in his statement, but when the time comes for voting I shall withdraw that request and let the vote come direct.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Is it not probably the purpose to kill the home loan bank bill by tacking on these amendments?

Mr. LUCE. I do not think so, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have very serious doubts if that is not the actual purpose.

Mr. LUCE. I do not think so.

Mr. Speaker, I am informed that I gave the House the impression that if the Glass-Borah amendment were left in adjournment would be delayed. My remarks about adjournment were meant to be wholly addressed to the effect of voting the Goldsborough measure into the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the conferees of the House on the good bill that they have brought back from the conference. There are some changes but very few that are material, and there is before you now practically the original bill as it passed the House. There is no issue before this House to-day on the merits of the home loan bank bill. So I will not spend any time in discussing the merits of the bill. I hope the bill will be able to speak in action for the confidence that its friends have placed in it.

I am a friend of the Goldsborough bill. I voted for it. This House voted for it when it passed this House some time ago. This House paid marked tribute to the legislative statesmanship of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] when it passed by an overwhelming vote his bill dealing with a vital and difficult financial problem. [Applause.] As you have been told, we are dealing to-day with a home loan bank bill and not an inflation or stabilizing measure, and the Senate of the United States had no business to tack on to the home loan bank bill as a rider the Glass-Borah amendment. We will offer no vote of confidence to the gentleman from Maryland by voting to attach his bill to this bill as a rider to the pending measure. As a friend of the Goldsborough bill I am going to vote against it as it is now before the House, and I am also going to vote against the Glass-Borah rider [applause], because I want a home loan bank bill, and there should be attached to that bill neither one of these riders. I think the House ought now, once and for all, to notify the Senators at the other end of this Capitol that we will not submit to the tacking on of legislative riders not germane to a great piece of legislation. [Applause.]

The home loan bank bill is large enough and big enough to stand by itself, and it needs no riders to be attached by the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol. If we want to make sure to pass this bill at this session, I say to the friends of the home loan bank bill, there is only one thing to do, and that is to vote down both riders. [Applause.]

If you do that you do not discredit the Goldsborough bill or its principles, because this House has overwhelmingly approved them before. Therefore a vote of confidence in the Goldsborough stabilizing bill is a useless gesture on the part of the House.

Vote down both riders or amendments and give the country the home loan bank bill practically as it passed the House.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. The home loan bank bill has to do with the encouragement of building homes and paying for homes in towns and cities, as I understand it.

Mr. REILLY. That is one of the purposes.

Mr. McSWAIN. What is the objection to also taking care of homes all over the country, on farms and everywhere else, through either the Glass amendment or the Steagall amendment? Let us take care of the American homes.

Mr. REILLY. I may say in answer to the gentleman that if I were sure if this House passed the Goldsborough bill that the Senate would pass it and the President would sign it, I would vote for it. Otherwise it would be a useless performance on the part of the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, earlier in this debate I requested that the amendment be divided but I desire to withdraw that request and vote directly on the main proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 217, not voting 87, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4780) to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, during the year 1932, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate bill amended section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act so as to extend the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans or advances to farmers for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer-fallowing, as well as for crop production.

The House amendment supplements the provisions of the Senate bill by further extending the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans or advances to farmers for livestock production, including poultry, and for carrying on dairy farming. The House amendment also eliminates the provision of existing law providing for preference to farmers who suffered from crop failures in 1931, and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, to take such security (other than or in addition to first liens on crops or livestock) as he may deem proper and sufficient for the loans or advances.

The Senate recedes on this amendment and also on the amendment which amends the title of the bill.

HENRY B. STEAGALL,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
ANNING S. PRALL,
L. T. MCFADDEN,
JAMES G. STRONG,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. From what I gleaned during the reading of the statement, the Senate virtually accepts the House amendments?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Senate accepts the House amendments in whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the bill is virtually the House bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Senate accepted the House amendments.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as the 'Emergency relief and construction act of 1932.'

"TITLE I—RELIEF OF DESTITUTION

"SECTION 1. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make available out of the funds of the corporation the sum of $300,000,000, under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, to the several States and Territories, to be used in furnishing relief and work relief to needy and distressed people and in relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment, but not more than 15 per cent of such sum shall be available to any one State or Territory. Such sum of $300,000,000 shall, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act, be available for payment to the governors of the several States and Territories for the purposes of this section, upon application therefor by them in accordance with subsection (c), and upon approval of such applications by the corporation.

"(b) All amounts paid under this section shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and, except in the case of Puerto Rico and the Territory of Alaska, shall be reimbursed to the corporation, with interest thereon at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, by making annual deductions, beginning with the fiscal year 1935, from regular apportionments made from future Federal authorizations in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads, of an amount equal to one-fifth of the share which such State or Territory would be entitled to receive under such apportionment, except for the provisions of this section, or of an amount equal to one-fifth of the amounts so paid to the governor of such State or Territory pursuant to this section and all accrued interest thereon to the date of such deduction, whichever is the lesser, until the sum of such deductions equals the total amounts paid under this section and all accrued interest thereon. Whenever any such deduction is made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately pay to the corporation an amount equal to the amount so deducted. If any State or Territory shall, within two years after the date of enactment of this act, enter into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment to the corporation of the amounts paid under this section to the governor of such State or Territory, with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, then the deduction under this subsection shall not be made unless such State or Territory shall be in default in the performance of the terms of such agreement. In the case of a default by the State or Territory in any such agreement, the agreement shall thereupon be terminated and reimbursement of the unpaid balance of the amount covered by such agreement shall be made by making annual deductions in the manner above provided (beginning with the fiscal year next following such default) from regular apportionments made to such State or Territory from future Federal authorizations in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads. Before any amount is paid under this section to the Governor of Puerto Rico or of the Territory of Alaska, Puerto Rico or the Territory of Alaska shall enter into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment of such amount with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon.

"(c) The governor of any State or Territory may from time to time make application for funds under this section, and in each application so made shall certify the necessity for such funds and that the resources of the State or Territory, including moneys then available and which can be made available by the State or Territory, its political subdivisions, and private contributions, are inadequate to meet its relief needs. All amounts paid to the governor of a State or Territory under this section shall be administered by the governor, or under his direction, and upon his responsibility. The governor shall file with the corporation and with the auditor of the State or Territory (or, if there is no auditor, then with the official exercising comparable authority) a statement of the disbursements made by him under this section.

"(d) Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the corporation to deny an otherwise acceptable application under this section because of constitutional or other legal inhibitions or because the State or Territory has borrowed to the full extent authorized by law. Whenever an application under this section is approved by the corporation in whole or in part, the amount approved shall be immediately paid to the governor of the State or Territory upon delivery by him to the corporation of a receipt therefor, stating that the payment is accepted subject to the terms of this section.

"(e) Any portion of the amount approved by the corporation for payment to the governor of a State or Territory shall, at his request, and with the approval of the corporation, be paid to any municipality or political subdivision of such State or Territory if (1) the governor makes as to such municipality or political subdivision a like certificate as provided in subsection (c) as to the State or Territory, and (2) such municipality or political subdivision enters into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment to the corporation of the amount so paid, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, at such times, and upon such other terms and conditions, as may be agreed upon between the corporation and such municipality or political subdivision. The amount paid to any municipality or political subdivision under this subsection shall not be included in any amounts reimbursable to the corporation under subsection (b) of this section.

"(f) As used in this section the term 'Territory' means Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

"TITLE II—LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

"SEC. 201. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered—

"(1) to make loans to, or contracts with, States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, public agencies of States, of municipalities, and of political subdivisions of States, public corporations, boards and commissions, and public municipal intrumentalities of one or more States, to aid in financing projects authorized under Federal, State, or municipal law which are self-liquidating in character, such loans or contracts to be made through the purchase of their securities, or otherwise, and for such purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to bid for such securities: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph, from purchasing securities having a maturity of more than 10 years;

"(2) to make loans to corporations formed wholly for the purpose of providing housing for families of low income, or for reconstruction of slum areas, which are regulated by State or municipal law as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and areas and methods of operation, to aid in financing projects undertaken by such corporations which are self-liquidating in character;

"(3) to make loans to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction, replacement, or improvement of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, canals, and markets, devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character;

"(4) to make loans to private limited dividend corporations to aid in financing projects for the protection and development of forests and other renewable natural resources, which are regulated by a State or political subdivision of a State and are self-liquidating in character; and

"(5) to make loans to aid in financing the construction of any publicly owned bridge to be used for railroad, railway, and highway uses, the construction cost of which will be returned in part by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, and the remainder by means of taxes imposed pursuant to State law enacted before the date of enactment of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932; and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to purchase bonds of any State, municipality, or other public body or agency issued for the purpose of financing the construction of any such bridge irrespective of the dates of maturity of such bonds.

"For the purposes of this subsection a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if such project will be made self-supporting and financially solvent and if the construction cost thereof will be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, or by such other means (other than by taxation) as may be prescribed by the statutes which provide for the project. All loans and contracts made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in respect of projects of the character specified in paragraphs (1) to (5) of this subsection shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on any such project, and that (except in executive, administrative, and supervisory positions), so far as practicable, no individual directly employed on any such project shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week, and that in the employment of labor in connection with any such project preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents.

"The provisions of this subsection shall apply with respect to projects in Puerto Rico and the Territories to the same extent as in the case of projects in the several States, and as used in this subsection the term "States" includes Puerto Rico and the Territories.

"(b) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures under this section and under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, together with a statement showing the names of the borrowers to whom loans and advances were made, and the amount and rate of interest involved in each case.

"(c) In order that the surpluses of agricultural products may not have a depressing effect upon current prices of such products, the corporation is authorized and directed to make loans, in such amounts as may in its judgment be necessary, for the purpose of financing sales of such surpluses in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce; but no such sales shall be financed by the corporation if, in its judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such products: Provided, however, That no such loan shall be made to finance the sale in the markets of foreign countries of cotton owned by the Federal Farm Board or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation.

"(d) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans to bona fide institutions, organized under the laws of any State or of the United States and having resources adequate for their undertakings, for the purpose of enabling them to finance the carrying and orderly marketing of agricultural commodities and livestock produced in the United States.

"(e) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized to create in any of the 12 Federal land-bank districts where it may deem the same to be desirable a regional agricultural credit corporation with a paid-up capital of not less than $3,000,000, to be subscribed for by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and paid for out of the unexpended balance of the amounts allocated and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Such corporations shall be managed by officers and agents to be appointed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under such rules and regulations as its board of directors may prescribe. Such corporations are hereby authorized and empowered to make loans or advances to farmers and stockmen, the proceeds of which are to be used for an agricultural purpose (including crop production), or for the raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of livestock, to charge such rates of interest or discount thereon as in their judgment are fair and equitable, subject to the approval of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to rediscount with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the various Federal reserve banks and Federal intermediate credit banks any paper that they acquire which is eligible for such purpose. All expenses incurred in connection with the operation of such corporations shall be supervised and paid by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under such rules and regulations as its board of directors may prescribe.

"(f) All loans made under this section, and all contracts of the character described in paragraph (1) of subsection (a), shall be fully and adequately secured. The corporation, under such conditions as it shall prescribe, may take over or provide for the administration and liquidation of any collateral accepted by it as security for such loans. Such loans shall be made on such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with this act, as the corporation may prescribe, and may be made directly upon promissory notes or by way of discount or rediscount of obligations tendered for the purpose, or otherwise in such form and in such amount and at such interest or discount rates as the corporation may approve: Provided, That no loans or advances (except loans under subsection (c)) shall be made upon foreign securities or foreign acceptances as collateral.

"(g) Each such loan may be made for a period not exceeding three years, and the corporation may, from time to time, extend the time of payment of any such loan, through renewal, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for such payment shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such loan was made originally: Provided, That loans or contracts of the character described in subsection (a) may be made for a period not exceeding 10 years: Provided further, That loans or contracts of the character described in paragraph (1) or (5) of subsection (a) may be made for a period exceeding 10 years when it is the judgment of the board of directors of the corporation that it is necessary to purchase securities as provided in such paragraphs and that it is not practicable to require the reimbursement of the corporation, within 10 years, through the repurchase or payment of such securities, or in any other manner.

"(h) The corporation may make loans under this section at any time prior to January 23, 1934.

"(i) No fee or commission shall be paid by any applicant for a loan under the provisions of this section in connection with any such application or any loan made or to be made under this section, and the agreement to pay or payment of any such fee or commission shall be unlawful.

"(j) No loan under this section shall be made to a railroad or to a receiver of a railroad except on the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Any railroad may obligate itself in such form as shall be prescribed and otherwise comply with the requirements of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the corporation with respect to the deposit or assignment of security hereunder, without the authorization or approval of any authority, State or Federal, and without compliance with any requirement, State or Federal, as to notification other than such as may be imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the corporation under the provisions of this section.

"SEC. 202. The last sentence of the second paragraph of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act is amended by striking out "5" and inserting "2⅝" in lieu thereof.

Every applicant for a loan under either of such acts shall, as a condition precedent thereto, consent to such examination as the corporation may require for the purposes of either of such acts and that reports of examinations by constituted authorities may be furnished by such authorities to the corporation upon request therefor.'

"SEC. 205. (a) The amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to have outstanding at any one time is increased to an aggregate of six and three-fifths times its subscribed capital stock.

"(b) The first proviso of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by inserting after 'as set out in section 9' the following: '(as in force prior to the enactment of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932),' but the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to continue making loans to farmers under the provisions of such section 2.

"SEC. 206. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to financial institutions, corporations, railroads, and other classes of borrowers specified in section 5 of such act, organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. As used in this title and in section 15 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act the term 'State' includes the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

"SEC. 207. No loan or advance shall be approved under this section or under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, directly or indirectly, to any financial institution any officer or director of which is a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or has been such a member within the 12 months preceding the approval of the loan or advance.

"(b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect in any manner the terms of office of the appointed members of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, nor to require their reappointment.

"SEC. 209. Section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'The Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is authorized to market for the corporation its notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations, using therefor all the facilities of the Treasury Department now authorized by law for the marketing of obligations of the United States. The proceeds of the obligations of the corporation so marketed shall be deposited in the same manner as proceeds derived from the sale of obligations of the United States, and the amount thereof shall be credited to the corporation on the books of the Treasury.'

"SEC. 210. Section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by adding after the second paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

All such discounts for individuals, partnerships, or corporations shall be subject to such limitations, restrictions, and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe.'

"SEC. 211. The first paragraph of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5. To aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, including facilitating the exportation of agricultural and other products the corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans, upon such terms and conditions not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, to any bank, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, insurance company, mortgage loan company, credit union, Federal land bank, joint-stock land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, agricultural credit corporation, livestock credit corporation, organized under the laws of any State or of the United States, including loans secured by the assets of any bank or savings bank that is closed, or in process of liquidation to aid in the reorganization or liquidation of such banks, upon application of the receiver or liquidating agent of such bank and any receiver of any national bank is hereby authorized to contract for such loans and to pledge any assets of the bank for securing the same: Provided, That not more than $200,000,000 shall be used for the relief of banks (including savings banks) that are closed or in process of liquidation.'

"TITLE III—PUBLIC WORKS

"SEC. 301. "(1) For expenditure in emergency construction on the Federal-aid highway system, $120,000,000. Such sum shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the several States by the method provided in section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 21). The amounts apportioned to the States shall be available as a temporary advance of funds to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds. The amount apportioned to any State under this paragraph may be used to match the regular annual Federal-aid apportionments made to such State (including the one for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933), and when so used such amount shall be available for expenditure in paying the share of such State in the cost of Federal-aid projects. No amounts apportioned under this paragraph shall be advanced except for work on the Federal-aid highway system performed before July 1, 1933: Provided, That the amounts so advanced shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of 10 years, commencing with the fiscal year 1938, by making annual deductions from regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act, as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That all contracts involving the expenditure of such amounts shall contain provisions establishing minimum rates of wages, to be predetermined by the State highway department, which contractors shall pay to skilled and unskilled labor, and such minimum rates shall be stated in the invitation for bids and shall be included in proposals or bids for the work: And provided further, That in the expenditure of such amounts, the limitations in the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, upon highway construction, reconstruction, and bridges within municipalities and upon payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds, shall not apply. As used in this paragraph, the term "State" includes the Territory of Hawaii. The term "highway," as defined in the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, for the purposes of this paragraph only, shall be deemed to include such main State parkways as may be designated by the State and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture as part of the Federal-aid highway system.

"(2) For expenditure in emergency construction during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, $16,000,000, as follows: (A) For the construction and improvement of national-forest highways, $5,000,000; (B) for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, and so forth, including the same objects specified in the paragraph commencing with the words 'Improvement of the national forests' under the heading 'National Forest Administration' in the agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1242), $5,000,000; (C) for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges, in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, including areas to be established as national parks authorized under the act of May 22, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 403 to 403c), and under the act of May 25, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 404 to 404c), and national park and monument approach roads authorized by the act of January 31, 1931 (46 Stat. 1053), as amended, or any one section of such roads of not less than 8 miles, which crosses lands wholly or to the extent of 90 per cent owned by the Government of the United States, $3,000,000; (D) for construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 25, sec. 318a), $1,000,000; and (E) for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than the forest reservations, under the provisions of section 3 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, secs. 3 and 3a), $2,000,000. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, are authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this section with a view to providing the maximum employment of local labor consistent with reasonable economy of construction.

"(3) For the prosecution of river and harbor projects heretofore authorized, $30,000,000.

"(4) For the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore authorized, $15,500,000.

"(5) For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 43, ch. 12A), $10,000,000.

"(6) For expenditure by the Department of Commerce for air-navigation facilities, including equipment, $500,000.

"SEC. 305. After the date of the enactment of this act, in the acquisition of any land or site for the purposes of section 301 (a) (10):

"(1) The period of solicitation of proposals by public advertisement shall be 10 days in lieu of 20 days;

"(2) In any case in which such site or land is to be acquired by condemnation, the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, shall not apply; and

"(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to expedite the construction of public buildings and works outside of the District of Columbia by enabling possession and title of sites to be taken in advance of final judgment in proceedings for the acquisition thereof under the power of eminent domain,' approved February 26, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 40, sec. 258a), in any case in which any land or any interest therein is to be acquired by condemnation, the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Attorney General, may, prior to the institution of condemnation proceedings, file with the clerk of the district court of the district in which such land is located a declaration of taking, containing the matters required by such section to be included in a declaration of taking. The declaration of taking shall be accompanied by the deposit with such clerk, to the use of the parties who may be found to be entitled thereto, of the amount of the estimated compensation stated in the declaration. As soon as practicable after the filing of such declaration of taking, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be posted in a prominent place upon the land a notice reciting (A) that the land or the interest therein is taken by the United States for public use, (B) that a declaration of taking in respect of such land or interest therein has been filed with the clerk of the court of the district, and (C) that there has been deposited with such clerk, to the use of the parties who may be found to be entitled thereto, the estimated just compensation for the land or interest therein taken. The Secretary of the Treasurg shall give written notice similar to the posted notice, by personal service in the case of actual occupants of the premises or, if with reasonable diligence such personal service can not be made, he shall send such notice by registered mail directed to the premises, and he shall send notice by registered mail directed to their last known address in the case of all parties who the Secretary ascertains have or may have an interest in such land, and he may give such additional notice by newspaper publication or otherwise as he deems necessary. Upon posting notice on the land, title to the land or interest therein shall vest in the United States, and the right to just compensation therefor shall vest in the parties entitled thereto. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause notice to be personally served upon, or if with reasonable diligence such service can not be made, to be sent by registered mail to actual occupants of the premises, setting a time (not earlier than 20 days after the service or sending of such notice) at which such parties shall surrender possession, and at the end of such time the right to possession shall vest in the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury may designate any person to serve any notice under the preceding provisions of this subsection and such person shall have power to enter upon such land for the purpose of posting notice or to make personal service of notice. If any such party fails or refuses so to surrender possession, upon summary petition for an order to surrender possession filed in such district court by or on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, the court may, by writ of assistance or other process, order the surrender of possession. A petition in condemnation shall be filed in such district court as soon after the filing of the declaration of taking as practicable. In any such condemnation proceeding, no further declaration of taking shall be required, and the provisions of section 1 of such act of February 26, 1931, authorizing the court to fix the time when parties in possession shall be required to surrender possession, shall not apply. If such petition for condemnation is not filed within a reasonable time after the filing of such declaration of taking, any person entitled to just compensation in respect of the property so taken shall be entitled to sue the United States in the court in which such declaration of taking was filed. The procedure in such suit shall be the same as in suits against the United States founded upon contract, except that such suit may be heard even if the amount of the claim is greater than $10,000 and except that the procedure for the ascertainment of the amount of just compensation shall be the same as such procedure in condemnation proceedings. If the petition for condemnation is filed prior to the time the commissioners in condemnation, jurors, or other persons charged with the duty of valuing the property are empaneled, such suit shall be dismissed, except that such suit and the condemnation proceedings may, in the discretion of the court, and under rules prescribed by it, be consolidated to such extent as the court may deem practicable. In any suit authorized to be brought under this subsection or in any condemnation proceeding involving land acquired in accordance with this subsection, the court shall enter judgment against the United States in favor of the parties entitled for the sum or sums awarded as just compensation, respectively, for the land or interest therein taken for the use of the United States and such judgment shall be paid out of the sums deposited with the court and such additional sums as may be awarded shall be paid in the same manner as sums awarded in judgments in cases in which the United States has consented to be sued. The provisions of such act of February 26, 1931, except as modified by this subsection, shall apply to all such suits or condemnation proceedings. The provisions of this subsection shall not be construed to be in substitution for but shall be supplemental to any method of acquiring land or interests therein provided in existing law.

"SEC. 306. In the construction of post offices and of buildings for post offices and other offices provided for in section 301 (a) (10), the Secretary of the Treasury with the cooperation of the Postmaster General may use such standard plans (heretofore or hereafter prepared) as may be most adaptable to the particular building to be constructed.

"SEC. 307. All contracts let for construction projects pursuant to this title shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on any such project, and that (except in executive, administrative, and supervisory positions), so far as practicable, no individual directly employed on any such project shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week, and that in the employment of labor in connection with any such project, preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents.

or after the date of the enactment of this act and on or before the last day of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made."

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1:

RELIEF OF DESTITUTION

The Senate amendment provided that in the case of a payment to a municipality or political subdivision for relief purposes the governor should furnish to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in addition to his own certificate, a certificate of the chief executive officer of the municipality or political subdivision as to need and the inadequacy of the resources of the municipality or political subdivision. The bill as agreed to in conference omits the provision requiring the additional certificate.

The House amendment to the Senate amendment leaves the interest rates on payments to a municipality or political subdivision to be agreed upon by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the municipality or political subdivision. The Senate amendment fixed the interest rate at 3 per cent in such cases.

The bill as agreed to in conference retains the Senate provision.

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Under both the Senate and House amendments loans may be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction of "water works" devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character. The Senate amendment included therewith "industrial water-supply systems." The conference agreement omits the Senate provision.

In the definition of a self-liquidating project the House amendment requires that the construction cost be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, or by other means "other than by taxation" as may be prescribed by the statute which provides for the project. The Senate amendment did not contain the language "other than by taxation." The bill as agreed to in conference retains this language.

The Senate amendment, in the prohibition against the use of convict labor as a condition to loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for self-liquidating projects, excepted persons on probation or parole. The House amendment contains no such provision. The bill as agreed to in conference omits this exception.

The House amendment requires a monthly report of the activities and expenditures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and a statement showing the names of the borrowers to whom loans and advances are made under that act. There was no such provision in the Senate amendment. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the House provision.

The Senate amendment contained a provision that no loans should be made for financing sales in foreign countries of cotton owned by the Federal Farm Board or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation. There is no such limitation in the House amendment. The conference bill retains the Senate provision.

The House amendment authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to bona fide American institutions having resources adequate for their undertakings for financing the carrying and orderly marketing of agricultural commodities and livestock produced in the United States. There was no similar provision in the Senate amendment. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the House provision.

Both the House and Senate amendments authorize the creation by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of regional agricultural-credit corporations, with paid-up capital in each case of not less than $3,000,000, to make loans or advances to farmers and stockmen. Under the Senate amendment the stock of these corporations was to be subscribed for by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The House amendment requires that at least one-half of such stock be subscribed for by private interests and the balance by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bill as agreed to in conference adopts the Senate provision.

The House amendment provides that loans may be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to institutions organized under the laws of the District of Columbia and under the new act for projects within the District of Columbia. There was no such provision in the Senate amendment. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the House provision.

The Senate amendment contained a provision prohibiting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from approving any loan or advance directly or indirectly to any financial institution any officer or director of which is a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or has been such member within 12 months preceding the approval of the loan or advance. There is no similar provision in the House amendment. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

The Senate amendment provided for the substitution of two appointive members on the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board and the Farm Loan Commissioner. There is no similar provision in the House amendment. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the Senate provision.

The Senate amendment contained a provision permitting the Federal Reserve Board, upon affirmative vote of not less than five members, to authorize the Federal reserve banks to discount for any individual or corporation paper eligible for discount for member banks under the Federal reserve act if such paper was indorsed and otherwise secured to the satisfaction of the Federal reserve banks. This authority was limited to a period of two years and the discounts were to be made only in unusual and exigent circumstances and where the individual or corporation was unable to secure adequate accommodations from other banking institutions. It was also provided that no paper so discounted should be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes. There is no similar provision in the House amendment. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the substance of the Senate provision but extends the discount privilege to partnerships as well as to individuals and corporations, removes the 2-year limitation, and eliminates the provision that the paper so discounted should not be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

The Senate amendment contained a provision making certain that loans might be made under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to closed savings banks. There is no similar provision in the House amendment. The bill, as agreed to in conference, retains the Senate provision.

FEDERAL PUBLIC WORKS

The Senate amendment permitted expenditures out of the funds appropriated for national park and monument approach roads upon any section of such roads of not less than 8 miles which crosses lands wholly or to the extent of 90 per cent owned by the Government of the United States.

The House amendment contains no similar provision. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the Senate provision.

The Senate amendment provided that except in the case of the $120,000,000 for Federal-aid roads and the $16,000,000 for national-park roads, trails, etc., no money should be expended on the public-works program "if the Secretary of the Treasury certifies to the President that the amount necessary for such expenditure is not available and can not be obtained upon reasonable terms." The House amendment provides that no such expenditure shall be made unless the Secretary of the Treasury certifies to the President that the amount necessary for the expenditure is available or can be obtained without interference with current financing operations of the Government. The bill as agreed to in conference adopts the Senate provision.

The House amendment authorizes an appropriation of not to exceed $7,436,000 for construction and installation at certain specified military posts, airports, and landing fields, of technical buildings and utilities and appurtenances. The Senate amendment contained no similar provision. The bill as agreed to in conference retains the House provision.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes on the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill.

J. W. COLLIER,
HENRY T. RAINEY,
R. L. DOUGHTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the statement is so complete that I do not desire at this time to make any extended observations except to say to the Members of the House that on the subject that seems now to be important to the House, the publicity provision with reference to loans, the Senate yielded and the House provision remains in the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. I would like to ask the gentleman if the publicity clause in the bill is applicable to States and cities as well as all other loans?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the bill contain the provision eliminating the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board as a director of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is very gratifying. I offered the amendment when we considered the original bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Senator WAGNER, who has been most earnest and courageous in the work for this bill, is now in the Chamber, and deserves great credit for what he did. [Applause.]

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Is the $30,000,000 available for rivers and harbors available for expenditure without restriction?

Mr. RAINEY. It depends on the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury whether the money is available.

Mr. ALMON. That does not apply to highway construction?

Mr. RAINEY. No.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What became of the Byrns amendment relating to the sale of cotton in foreign countries?

Mr. RAINEY. We concurred in the Senate amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Does the publicity clause apply to banks that have made loans in the past, or only in the future?

Mr. RAINEY. I made a statement on the floor that it was not retroactive, but since making that statement I have made a more careful study of the provisions, and I think it is retroactive. However, there are not many who agree with me on that proposition.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I did not catch the words as read by the Clerk concerning the provisions as to municipal and other political subdivisions obtaining loans. Was any change made in sections (c), (d), and (e)?

Mr. RAINEY. For self-liquidation propositions?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. You will remember that I asked about the application of the provisions of paragraphs (c), (d), and (e) of section 1, of Title I, to loans which might be requested by municipalities and other political subdivisions. When this bill was under consideration in the House on July 13 (see p. 15226), the point was whether the corporation was permitted to consider loans requested by municipalities or other political subdivisions whose present borrowing power was limited or not now in existence on account of constitutional or other legal inhibition or because loans had heretofore been made to the full extent authorized by law.

As I now understand it, there is no change in said paragraphs, and any municipality or other political subdivision is given by this bill exactly the same privilege as the State. In other words, it makes no difference if a municipality or other political subdivision has borrowed to the full extent authorized by law or whether there are any existing constitutional or other legal inhibitions to borrowing more money. The only requirement is that the governor makes the recommendation to the corporation, and the governor can make the recommendation, if he desires, without the approval of the mayor or other official in authority. If the governor makes the recommendation and request, the corporation may consider the application for the loan and grant the same to a municipality or other political subdivision of a State or Territory exactly the same as it could to such State or Territory itself.

Mr. RAINEY. It depends on the governor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me 30 minutes?

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield the gentleman 20 minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the conference report, not because I approve all of its provisions, but I think when you are beaten the best thing to do is acknowledge it, take your medicine, and go along. [Applause.] I feel that the minority in this case is absolutely in the right. If the session had not been in its last stages, the Senate would not have yielded to the publicity provision and the conference would have remained in deadlock. Before making any further statement I wish to say that the acceptance of this report upon the part of the House is directly contrary to the advice and unanimous opinion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In that connection I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a statement made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through Mr. Cooksey, its secretary, to the Senate conferees this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement made by Mr. Cooksey to the Senate conferees. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, it will therefore become necessary for me to read extracts from this statement which has to do purely with the publicity item, which was the only one in which the conference was in final disagreement. That publicity item is a campaign issue of the vice presidential candidate. [Applause on Democratic side.] Well, we are glad to have you approve of it. Undoubtedly it is not only an issue of the vice presidential candidate, but I assume that the vice presidential candidate has consulted the presidential candidate in this matter and that the same is agreeable to him. [Applause on Democratic side.] Here is the statement that was issued this morning by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the rules of the House the gentleman may not read an outside statement if there is objection to it. I am always glad to hear from the gentleman himself.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I shall read this as my own statement and say that I agree to the contents of it.

Mr. HOWARD. I can not consent to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska make the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not entitled to read the document?

Mr. HOWARD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman is not entitled to read the document.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to read the paper.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to read the paper.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 162, noes 67.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY read as follows:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, July 14, 1932.

The attention of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been called to a provision inserted yesterday by the House of Representatives in the so-called relief bill providing for the monthly publication of a report covering all of the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, "together with a statement showing the names of the borrowers to whom loans and advances were made and the amount involved in each case."

This would mean that all loans made—or to be made—by this corporation to banks, insurance companies, mortgage-loan companies, building and loan associations, and other financial institutions would become public property.

In the opinion of the board, this provision, if enacted into law, would undo much that has been accomplished by this corporation in preserving the credit structure of the Nation and, in a large measure, restrict its usefulness in the future. The publication of the loans made by this corporation to the financial and fiduciary institutions above enumerated, whose relations with the public are of a particularly sensitive character, would, in the board's judgment, be decidedly harmful, more especially if the fact that these institutions are borrowing from this corporation and the amount of the loans is published, as it would be, without adequate explanation of their circumstances or resources or the conditions under which the advances were made.

One of the fundamental purposes of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is to strengthen our credit structure and to prevent bank closings under the extremely difficult conditions resulting from this great depression. No one can contend that the publication of the names of the 3,600 banks that have borrowed from this corporation will tend to strengthen their position. In the absence of a complete explanation of all of the circumstances, which this corporation clearly could not give in the reports contemplated, it is self-evident that such a procedure, far from strengthening these institutions, would weaken them, and thus destroy the very purpose for which the corporation was created.

And what is true of the banks is, in large measure, true of the other institutions.

Such a provision was considered by both Houses at the time the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was enacted and rejected by both of them for the reasons above mentioned.

The reason advanced in favor of such a proposal is that this kind of publicity is necessary in order to subject to constant scrutiny the actions of the corporation.

But such an objective can equally well be attained through a select committee of the Senate or House, to whom the books of the corporation would be opened at all times, as has already been provided by the Senate. The Senate committee has asked for the very information provided for in the section above-mentioned. The information is being compiled and will be furnished to that committee at an early date. Thus, the public interests are fully safeguarded.

In the unanimous opinion of the board, therefore, not only is there no necessity for the paragraph inserted in the House bill, but such a provision is against the public interest and may result in irreparable damage.

By direction of the board of directors:

Respectfully,

G. R. COOKSEY, Secretary.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, that shows that the responsible financial body to whom you are entrusting this extra billion and three-quarters dollars of the people's money does not approve of this publicity item and says that it may result in irreparable damage to our financial institutions.

Mr. MANLOVE. And do the Democratic members of that board subscribe to that also?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is the unanimous opinion. Three of the members are Democrats, sitting with the conferees this morning, and they approved this letter when it was read to the Senate conferees.

Mr. MANLOVE. And was Mr. Jones of Texas, one of that number?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It was said in the press recently that the ex-chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation borrowed $80,000,000 for his bank from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation after he had resigned. How did that become public?

Mr. TREADWAY. Hearsay evidence is mighty poor evidence. The actual evidence has been submitted, as I understand it, by the gentleman from Illinois. He was the one who mentioned the figures yesterday. I do not know anything about the accuracy of the figures, but it was $10,000,000 rather than $80,000,000. Therefore, it was only eight times exaggerated.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And has it not also been published that Mr. Dawes stated to the public that his getting that money had saved his bank?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not exactly catch the idea of the gentleman's inquiry, but if the loan to the bank with which Mr. Dawes was connected saved the financial situation in the city of Chicago, it was money well loaned.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I agree with the gentleman, and will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. It not only saved his bank but the other two big financial institutions of Chicago and practically the financial situation of the city.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Notwithstanding the publicity given to it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me call attention once more in closing to this fact: The President of the United States has done everything within his power to get a sensible and workable relief measure through this Congress. We are hereby inserting a clause which from every evidence obtainable will be detrimental to all interests in the country, except, evidently, the political ambitions of the Speaker of this House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to use any further time.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report, and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 286, nays 48, not voting 96, as follows:

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker, I came in the door as the vote was being taken, and before I could find out what the question before the House was my name had been passed. If I had been permitted to vote, I would have voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

INFORMATION RESPECTING INCOME-TAX RETURNS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution (S. J. Res. 206) making available to the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate certain information in the possession of the Treasury Department and the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 206

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make available and to furnish to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate such information in the possession of the Treasury Department and the Bureau of Internal Revenue with respect to income-tax returns as may be called for and deemed necessary by such committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, or their duly authorized agents, pursuant to the investigation being conducted under Senate Resolution 84 as continued by Senate Resolution 239.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this joint resolution, such Committee on Banking and Currency shall have all the rights and privileges of a select committee of the Senate within the meaning of section 257 (b) (1) of the revenue act of 1926.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what that is. I did not understand it from the reading.

Mr. RAINEY. It gives to the Committee on Banking and Currency authority to apply to the Bureau of Internal Revenue and to the Treasury Department for information they may need in conducting an investigation they have been authorized to conduct into income-tax matters and other matters.

Mr. SNELL. They have been given authority to make an investigation. Why do they need our added authority to do that? What is the reason for it?

Mr. RAINEY. A joint resolution is necessary for that purpose. Under the law as it now stands, they would not be entitled to it unless we passed the resolution. They could not go on, on their own initiative, as I understand it.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand the object of it. What are they investigating?

Mr. RAINEY. The Senate has authorized an investigation of that kind into income-tax returns and corporation-tax returns, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. SNELL. If the Senate has authorized it, very well; but the House has not authorized any such investigation.

Mr. RAINEY. But the authorization by the Senate, as I am advised, does not carry with it the right to obtain information from the Income Tax Bureau or the Treasury Department, unless we pass a joint resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman allow that to go over until to-morrow until we may know a little more about it? I do not know that I want to object to it, but I would like to consider it.

Mr. RAINEY. I will withdraw it for the present and will call it up to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. Permit the Chair to make a statement to the House.

The Chair understands that there is a disposition in the Senate, in fact, a resolution is being prepared at the present time, for the Congress to adjourn to-morrow at 2.30 or 3 o'clock. That resolution must be adopted in order to permit suspension of the rules to-morrow. It has occurred to the Chair that he has on his list but one bill at the present time for which he expects to recognize a Member to suspend the rules, and that is the bill of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH]. It is known as the soldier bill, which fixes the rate of interest and allows 200,000 men to borrow money on their certificates who can not borrow at the present time. There is not very much more to do here, and it occurred to the Chair when he consulted the Minority Leader, that we might take a recess until such time as the Chair might call the House together, giving 10 minutes' notice, with the sole purpose when we are called together again, of agreeing to the adjournment resolution. I do not know whether the House wishes to do that or not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We all know the bill which the Speaker has in mind. The Speaker has described it. Could not that bill be called up under unanimous consent, coupled with the request that it would be called up and only one amendment considered, in order that we might dispose of it? I am sure no one will object under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Certainly that bill could be considered under those conditions.

If the gentleman from New Jersey desires to ask unanimous consent to call up this bill under the condition that only one amendment can be offered and that one by himself, and that no amendment to the amendment can be offered, I am sure we could accomplish the same result that we could under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see the gentleman from New Jersey in the Chamber. He expected it to be called up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had an understanding with the gentleman from New Jersey that he would be recognized to call it up to-morrow.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are we then to understand that under suspension of the rules no Member will be recognized so the House may consider the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the modification of the Volstead Act?

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in all sincerity, so I may be guided when the request for adjournment is made, I would like an answer to my inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 473. Joint resolution to amend the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia," approved July 8, 1932;

H. J. Res. 474. Joint resolution making available as of July 1, 1932, the appropriations contained in the regular annual appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1933 for the Departments of Agriculture, Post Office, Treasury, and War, and ratifying obligations incurred in anticipation thereof; and

H. J. Res. 475. Joint resolution making an appropriation for the payment of pages for the Senate and House of Representatives from July 16 to July 25, 1932.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 4522. An act to authorize the conveyance to the State of Tennessee of certain land deeded to the United States for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park and not needed therefor;

S. 4574. An act to extend the provisions of the national bank act to the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes.

S. 4661. An act to repeal an act entitled "An act to legalize the incorporation of national trade-unions," approved June 29, 1886.

S. 4747. An act to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries, and products of the soil, mine, and sea; and

S. 4780. An act to provide that advances under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act may be made to producers of livestock, including poultry, and to dairy farmers, and may be made for crop planting or crop cultivation, including summer fallowing, during the year 1932.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, is the request that the House take a recess going to be made by the majority leader?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Illinois desires to make it or not.

Is there objection to standing in recess subject to the call of the Chair with the understanding that the bells will be rung 10 minutes before the assembling of the House, the object being solely for the purpose of agreeing to an adjournment resolution sent over to the House? Permit the Chair to say that that is a privileged matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to ask unanimous consent to consider the Bacharach resolution to which the Chair has just referred under the same conditions as we would under suspension of the rules to-morrow, which would mean to bring it up without any opportunity of amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is not in the hall at the moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are a number of us, Mr. Speaker, who are vitally interested in the bill, and several of us would like to ask unanimous consent that it may be disposed of to-night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels some responsibility for the absence of the gentleman from New Jersey. The gentleman from New Jersey has taken very great interest in the matter. The gentleman brought it out of the Ways and Means Committee with some opposition. The Chair feels, having told him he would recognize him to call it up to-morrow after the resolution of adjournment was agreed to, that it would not be quite fair to do otherwise.

Mr. SNELL. There is very little to be taken up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. It may be taken up to-morrow by unanimous consent or under suspension of the rules.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only purpose any of us have is to make certain of its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in sympathy with that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no desire to take any credit from the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be willing to recognize anybody who can get the bill through, and when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] returns to the House, after an adjournment resolution comes over, we can pass the bill to-night.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand it is the position of the Speaker that in order to have suspension of the rules to-morrow it will be necessary to pass the adjournment resolution to-day? Could we not have suspension of the rules by passing the adjournment resolution the first thing to-morrow afternoon?

The SPEAKER. As soon as we agree to the adjournment resolution we could suspend the rules. Responsible leaders of the Senate have suggested to the Chair that we adjourn at 2 o'clock to-morrow. The Chair told them it could not be before 2.30 because the Parliamentarian advised the Chair it would take that length of time to clear up matters now on the Speaker's table and to enroll the bills we have passed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, can we not clear up some of the matters on the Speaker's table now?

Mr. SNELL. There is an appropriation bill to carry out the purposes of the home loan bank bill that will have to be taken up to-morrow. This will take a little time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, why could not this soldiers' proposition be taken care of by the majority leader obtaining unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] be recognized by the Speaker immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow to move to suspend the rules and pass that bill with an amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Parliamentarian suggests to the Chair that unless we can get this bill through quickly its engrossment and return to the Senate may endanger its final enactment. If the Members will give the Chair their confidence he will call the House to order when the Senate sends over an adjournment resolution, ringing the bells 10 minutes before the House will be called to order. The House will be called to order for the sole purpose of adopting that resolution. The Parliamentarian suggests that if this is done it could be done with the distinct understanding that we transact no other business except that of agreeing to the adjournment resolution sent over by the Senate and disposing of the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] to suspend the rules.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Speaker's statement assumes that there is unanimity of agreement as to adjournment. Some of us in the House feel that under the present conditions of the country the Congress should not entirely relinquish its control of the situation, that we should recess rather than adjourn, and I am sure we will have an opportunity of expressing ourselves, particularly the progressive group of this House, when the resolution is presented.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair state to the gentleman from New York that with this full attendance of the membership and with the understanding that the bells will be rung 10 minutes prior to our meeting, the Members will be present and there may then be a contest as to whether you want to adjourn.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on this veterans' proposition I understand the movement now is to change the rate of interest and we are up against this parliamentary situation that is likely to result in the destruction of that bill. I understand it is now agreed that the rate of interest shall be changed from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent. I have just had a conversation with one of the leaders at the other end of the Capitol, and he said that if that is done the chances are it will result in a tie-up in the Senate. This bill ought to be passed before the adjournment resolution; and if the Senate does tie it up, I am going to oppose the passage of any adjournment until that bill becomes a law. I wanted to make this statement to the House, because that information is first-hand. I just received it from one of the Senate leaders.

JAMES W. BOYER, JR.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 289

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $250 to James W. Boyer, jr., for extra and expert services as expert legal examiner to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation from February 13, 1932, to July 13, 1932, first session of Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. My impression is that in connection with an omnibus authorization bill providing help to the various committees the gentleman stated that would be the last instance where we would have occasion to vote additional salaries. Am I in error?

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman is in error. I stated to the House that the only exception would be in the case of Major Boyer.

Mr. STAFFORD. And he is covered in this resolution?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. This is the customary resolution. I wish to state further that when Congress adjourns Major Boyer retires from this position, and this is to give notice that any successor who may come after him will not be accorded this extra compensation in the future, and no one else will, so far as the present Committee on Accounts is concerned.

Before moving the previous question, I feel I express the sentiment of the entire House in appreciation of the valuable services which Major Boyer has rendered the membership. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. There are many hundreds of employees in the Veterans' Bureau who work harder and render more valuable services to the veterans than Major Boyer. Just because he is on the hill where he has a chance to meet the Members is no reason why he should be singled out from among the rest of the thousands of employees and given this additional amount, particularly in these days when Federal employees' salaries are being reduced in the name of economy.

Mr. WARREN. This is the usual resolution.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin I wish to say that Major Boyer served 19 months in France with the Twenty-sixth Division. The gentleman from Wisconsin is wrong when he says there is any employee who knows as much about veterans' disabilities as Major Boyer.

Mr. SCHAFER. I know there are many who know much more than he knows, because I have taken up thousands of cases with the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Major Boyer was on the pay roll of the Veterans' Bureau during all of this time. That being so, why should we pay him out of the House contingent fund for services rendered here as contact officer?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is the usual resolution introduced ever since he has been there and it is the last resolution of this nature that will be brought up at any time by the present Committee on Accounts.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not a fact that Major Boyer has worked hours and hours of overtime for the convenience of the Members here who come to him after the House has adjourned, whereas if he were in the Veterans' Bureau he would be off at half past 4 o'clock?

Mr. WARREN. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not true that this is the customary resolution and that the reason for its adoption is that the employee of the Veterans' Bureau who is assigned to the Capitol works long hours because he is compelled many times to work long after the customary quitting time of Government employees?

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order for the Speaker to recognize Members now for suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

VETERANS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 4569) relating to loans to veterans on their adjusted-service certificates, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the matter which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of subdivision (b) of section 502 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 642 (b)), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia (hereinafter in this section called 'bank'), is authorized to loan to any veteran upon his promissory note secured by his adjusted-service certificate (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof) any amount not in excess of the loan basis (as defined in subdivision (g) of this section) of the certificate."

SEC. 2. (a) Subdivisions (c) and (d) of section 502 of such act, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 642 (c) and 642 (d)), are hereby amended by striking out "6 per cent" wherever occurring in such subdivisions and inserting in lieu thereof "3½ per cent."

(b) Subdivision (l) of section 502 of such act, as amended (U. S. C., Sup. V, title 38, sec. 642 (l)), is amended by striking out "4½ per cent" and inserting in lieu thereof "3½ per cent."

(c) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall not apply with respect to interest accrued prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 3. Subdivision (m) of section 502 of such act, as amended (U. S. C., Sup. V, title 38, sec. 642 (m)), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(m) Loans made by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under this section may, at his option, be made out of the United States Government life-insurance fund, or out of the adjusted-service certificate fund created under section 505. In case of loans made out of the United States Government life-insurance fund, the fund shall be entitled to receive interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually, but, in respect of interest on any such loan accruing after this subdivision as amended takes effect, the amount by which interest at such rate exceeds 3½ per cent per annum, compounded annually, shall be paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund out of the adjusted-service certificate fund."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the bill; but in order that we may have a hearing, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is any Member opposed to the bill? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas to demand a second.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Texas for 20 minutes.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, there are two features to this bill; the first and principal feature is that it eliminates the 2-year provision of the World War adjusted compensation act of May 19, 1924, section 502 (b), thereby making the loan privileges on adjusted-service certificates available immediately after issuance.

The second feature of the bill reduces the rate of interest charged on loans made on adjusted-service certificates from 4½ per cent compounded annually, to 3½ per cent compounded annually.

When the bill was originally considered by the Ways and Means Committee the rate of interest was reduced to 4 per cent, but this morning the committee met and decided to make the rate 3½ per cent.

The harshness of the 2-year prohibition covering loan privileges was not fully appreciated until following the enactment of the law of February 27, 1931, which permitted a loan of 50 per cent of the face value of the certificate. For good and sufficient reasons that act did not amend the loan prohibition in any manner, so that a great number of veterans who had previously deferred making application for certificates were not, upon the issuance of their certificates, extended the enlarged borrowing privileges of the act of February 27, 1931.

These veterans were as hard hit by the depression as those who had already had their adjusted-service certificates in their possession. Apparently they had not theretofore felt the need of applying to their Government for aid, and had it not been for the depression many of them probably would never have applied for their certificates.

It hardly seems fair or just, therefore, that under their changed circumstances and when adversity overtakes them these veterans should be discriminated against or penalized for their patriotic motives by depriving them of the immediate benefits of the act of February 27, 1931, and forcing them to wait for two years thereafter before they could borrow on their certificates.

According to the Veterans' Administration this bill will make immediately available the 50 per cent loan privilege to about 200,000 veterans, who otherwise would have to wait until the 2-year period from the date of their certificates had lapsed; more than 100,000 veterans would have to wait until the year 1933 before they would be able to borrow on their certificates.

The question has been raised as to how much it will cost the Government to make these loans immediately available. It is estimated that the bill will affect approximately 200,000 veterans holding certificates, with an average loan value of $500, which would make a total of $100,000,000.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. In other words, this waives the 2-year period?

Mr. BACHARACH. It eliminates the 2-year period and reduces the rate of interest on loans.

Mr. BRIGGS. And they have the same privilege now that any man would have had who waited two years.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In other words, the bill changes existing law so that these certificates are eligible for a loan without waiting the 2-year period.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes; immediately on the passage of the bill. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it the gentleman's purpose to substitute this bill for the bill that passed the Senate?

Mr. BACHARACH. I was coming to that point, and I will make the explanation now.

A bill similar to the original Bacharach bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator COPELAND. Senator NORRIS had previously introduced a bill for the purpose of reducing the rate on loans to 3 per cent. There was no provision in his bill for eliminating the 2-year provision. When the Norris bill was reached on the calendar in the Senate Senator COPELAND moved to substitute his bill for the Norris bill; Senator NORRIS agreed to this, with the provision that his bill should be added as an amendment; this changed the rate of interest in the Copeland bill to 3 per cent, and the additional language of the Norris bill was simply a duplication of what was provided for in the Copeland bill. It was the opinion of the bureau officials that the Bacharach bill was in better form than the bill as passed by the Senate, and for that reason the House committee struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substituted the so-called Bacharach bill; so it is the Bacharach bill which we are now considering, with the interest rate made 3½ per cent instead of 4 per cent.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. Why is it we can not reduce this interest to 3 per cent, in accordance with the Senate bill?

Mr. BACHARACH. There are a number of reasons offered by the Veterans' Bureau why the interest should not be made less than 4 per cent. However, I am particularly interested in getting the first part of the bill enacted into law, and I think we are stretching it as far as we can in reducing it to 3½ per cent, with any assurance that the bill will have approval.

Mr. MOUSER. I want to compliment the gentleman on his effort.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Does this provision as to the interest apply to the past or to the future?

Mr. BACHARACH. It is not retroactive.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Does the gentleman have any information as to the statement that was made on the floor a little while ago, that if the interest was put at 3½ per cent there would be a disagreement with the Senate?

Mr. BACHARACH. The Senate passed the bill with interest at the rate of 3 per cent, without a dissenting vote, but I am hopeful that because of the other feature of the bill the Senate will accept the 3½ per cent rate and pass the House bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When the gentleman referred to the cost being $100,000,000——

Mr. BACHARACH. $140,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. $140,000,000. Is that to be spread over the 13 years?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Where in the bill do you eliminate the 2-year provision? That was put in by construction.

Mr. BACHARACH. The bill in amending section 502 (b) simply leaves out the provision in the present law reading "after the expiration of two years after the date of the certificate."

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. In the last six months the veteran who borrowed from the bank had to pay 6 per cent. Does this correct that?

Mr. BACHARACH. It does.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this reduction of interest retroactive?

Mr. BACHARACH. No. It takes effect on the approval of the bill. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the reduction of interest, provided in this bill, does not amount to very much. It should be eliminated entirely if the certificates are not paid in full now.

I am interested in the provision that veterans who are holders of adjusted-service certificates, acquired within the last two years, may borrow 50 per cent of their face value now; and in the future the holder of a certificate will be permitted to borrow on it immediately after it is obtained. This provision affects 215,000 veterans. The reduction of interest will only apply to future loans and will not apply to the loans now in existence unless these loans are paid and a new loan is negotiated; such instances will be rare.

SITUATION CONFRONTING COUNTRY

Very few people realize the grave situation confronting our country. I shudder to think of the consequences if something is not done to alleviate the situation at a very early date. Precedents and politics must be forgotten and measures agreed upon that will save our country. No citizen of Germany, France, England, or Italy is allowed to go without food or sufficient clothing. Here, to-day, men are starving on our Capitol Grounds. Many of these men bear the scars of battle; they bared their breasts to enemies' bullets and offered to shed their last drop of blood for the cause of their country when their country needed them only a few years ago. We have given billions of dollars to foreign countries, which they are using to provide for their people while our own needy people receive little consideration. It is not the duty of a State to relieve unemployment and distress caused by a policy adopted by the national administration. It is the duty of the National Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the legislation at all. He is talking about unemployment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like a ruling upon my point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this is to benefit the unemployed veterans. The gentleman is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. I think the gentleman stated that it did not apply to old policies.

Mr. PATMAN. Unless they are renewed.

Mr. BACHARACH. Oh, no. It applies to all policies, reducing them to 3½ per cent.

Mr. PATMAN. I understand the present loans would not be retroactive. The amendment is new and I have not had time to read it carefully.

Mr. BACHARACH. No.

Mr. PATMAN. But they will get the benefit of it.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I am glad to get that information. That being true, the veterans who have borrowed will be required to pay the 4½ or 6 per cent interest until this bill becomes a law, but from that date on the rate will be 3½ per cent compounded annually. This bill is before the House under suspension of the rules; no one can offer an amendment.

RELIEF FOR OTHERS AS WELL AS VETERANS

It is not relief for veterans alone that we should contend for but it is relief for all our people who are needy. Money and credit intended for their benefit, furnished by the Government, will not reach them if sent by the way of the big interests and greedy international bankers who have made the greatest contribution to our present plight. Our needy people, victims of a false governmental philosophy, should not be required to look to corporations for sympathetic care and attention when they need their country. It seems that our Government is favoring artificial persons. So far this is a big-business Congress; the needy people have not received sympathetic consideration by those who can cause the passage or defeat of legislation. We need legislation that will help people get out of debt, not the kind that will get them further into debt. This Congress must not adjourn until relief legislation is passed.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

We had a bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates. If passed, the new money would have gone into all the banks of the Nation and saved them; credit would have been expanded ten times for the benefit of all the people; purchasing power would have been placed in the hands of consumers and would have immediately gone into the channels of trade. The bill was killed. Why? The charge of fiat or printing-press money was urged against it. But a way was devised whereby the national banks could take Government obligations drawing 3⅜ per cent interest and get a similar kind of money issued and that bill receives serious consideration from the opponents of fiat money. The veterans were asking that their Government obligations be converted into circulating obligations of the Government. They were refused. The national banks asked for the same thing. The request of the banks is granted. It is said that the adjusted-service certificates are not due now; that they are due in 1945. If the veterans are paid the amounts confessed by the Government as of the time the services were rendered and the same governmental policy in regard to interest payments is adopted for their benefit as was adopted for the war profiteers and others the full amount was due October 1, 1931.

The amount they have borrowed, 50 per cent, represents what is due for accumulated interest and is no part of the principal. However, they are paying interest on this interest they are borrowing, which will consume the principal by 1945.

PAY THE NEEDY ONES

I have introduced a bill providing for the payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates to needy veterans. This bill was introduced after conferring with Congressmen RANKIN, CONNERY, and other Members of the House interested in this legislation. We are opposed to the policy but willing to adopt and recommend it as an expedient for this session only. If passed, it will require about $1,000,000,000 to pay the needy ones. The money is to be raised in the same way provided in the bill that passed the House. The money will have the same backing and the same principle will be invoked for its issuance as the money proposed to be issued to national banks. The banks will get a subsidy of $32,500,000 a year to use a billion dollars, under the Glass plan, whereas the veterans will accept the billion in payment of a debt and the Government will not pay the annual subsidy of $32,500,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The Glass plan, to which the gentleman refers, is the Glass bill in the Senate that was tacked onto the home loan bank bill as a rider.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is correct. I ask the membership of this House to seriously consider this proposition. The same body that defeated the bill to pay the veterans, on the theory that flat money was proposed to be issued in payment of those certificates, turned and indorsed the proposition of letting the national banks take a billion dollars of Government bonds, put them up to the Treasury, and let the Treasury Department call up the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and have a billion dollars of new crisp greenbacks printed for those banks and sent to them, less the cost of printing, which is insignificant.

Not only will they get the use of the money but they will get interest upon the bonds put up as collateral or on deposit to secure that money. Why should we pay those banks a subsidy equal to a net profit of $32,500,000 a year to take a billion dollars when we can pay the veterans a debt, not a dole, that is due, that is past due, if you pay like you have to everybody else? That money will go into every nook and corner of the country; it will go into the banks, and these banks will stop breaking, because they will have plenty of money to do business with. It will not only help the veterans, but everybody. It will promote the general welfare. Every dollar of that new money will be a basis for $10 of additional credit.

WILL BONUS MARCHERS BE ORDERED AWAY?

I understand it is rumored that the President, as soon as this Congress adjourns, is going to order these veterans, who are here, out of the city. I hope that rumor is not true. I did not cause them to come here. I have discouraged everyone who asked me about it, either by letter or by wire, but that is not the question involved in this case. I hope those veterans who are interested in this legislation, when Congress adjourns, can see their way clear and it is convenient for them to return to their homes. Let them as citizens take interest in good government. I believe they can promote the interest of the people better in that way; but there are men here who do not have a home, who settled on Government property. It is the only home that they have on earth There is no reason why they should be denied that home, and I do not believe that anyone would encourage them to leave it if they have no other home.

I hope that extreme means will not be used or pressure used to put them off Government property, if the property is not needed for any governmental purpose. If it is needed, of course, there is no excuse for occupying the property. I say that these men have conducted themselves in a commendable way. I hope they keep their poise as they have in the past. If they do, they will have the sympathy of the American people; but if they lose that poise and lose their heads and get mad at everyone who opposes them, they are not going to have the sympathy of the American people. I feel they have the right side, the side of justice and logic and reason. Therefore, there is no reason for them to get angry with anyone, but they should in the right manner try to persuade people who are against them to come to their side. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, my only object in discussing this bill is to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who has just been discussing it, has been advocating full payment and several things that will never be adopted.

This bill is practically the same bill introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] and myself in the first days of the session, and one that has been indorsed, I believe, by practically all of the veterans' organizations who know more about the welfare of these service men than individuals.

I am heartily in favor of its enactment. [Applause.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, of course I shall vote for this bill to permit these veterans to borrow on their adjusted-service certificates without having to wait two years, and to reduce the interest rate to 3½ per cent. [Applause.]

I for one shall oppose any adjournment of Congress until this measure becomes law. I will go farther than that. I will oppose any adjournment resolution until the bill referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] becomes law; until we give some real relief. If you adjourn to-day, you will leave this country in a terrible condition. Did you know that wheat went lower on yesterday than it had been in 400 years? You have intensified this panic with your Finance Corporation and other deflationary measures. I say you have made this panic worse, and you are getting ready to adjourn without giving the American people any relief.

Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to protest also against the adjournment of this Congress until the Senate of the United States votes on the widows and orphans' bill that was passed by this House by more than 10 to 1. Did you know that there are widows and orphans of World War veterans who had service-connected disabilities—tuberculosis, cancer, paralysis, and other diseases contracted in the trenches of France—who are denied one penny? You passed the bill almost unanimously, but unfortunately it has never been passed at the other end of the Capitol. I shall oppose any adjournment resolution until that bill is passed by the Senate, or at least until a vote is taken by the Senate and an opportunity is given to take care of the widows and orphans of those men who went down to their deaths, many of them as a result of their service in France.

I just want to serve notice on the House that I, for one, am going to oppose an adjournment resolution to-morrow unless we pass a bill that will take care of these veterans who are unemployed, and to whom the Government owes this debt, and at the same time relieve suffering throughout the United States. If that bill is passed, it will start wheat and corn and cotton and other commodities on the rise. It will at least be a beginning.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not true that the Democratic platform in Chicago killed the widows and orphans bill and killed the bonus?

Mr. RANKIN. No; it did not. It never mentioned it, and the gentleman from South Dakota knows it.

We passed that bill, and I do not think there was a Democratic vote against it. It has gone over to the other end of the Capitol, and through propaganda spread by certain influences in this country they have managed to prevent its passage up to the present moment. By stopping the passage of this bill they have denied one dollar to the widows and orphans of those men who gave their lives for their country in time of war, and many of whom are in your districts begging for bread from door to door. No! I will not vote for any adjournment resolution until you do something for these widows and orphans as well as for all the American people to offset what you have done to them. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, just one answer to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. No one knows better than he that the widows and orphans of the men who gave their lives to their country in battle or who died from service-connected disabilities as a result of their service during the World War are now being compensated by the Government. [Applause.] We should keep our facts straight. The bill to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers, and I voted for it, would pay a pension to widows and orphans of men whose death was not the result of their service. The service-connected cases are being cared for, and the gentleman from Mississippi knows it.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I regret that I can not. I do not consider this bill as does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] as a relief bill or as a measure to aid unemployment among veterans. It is a bill solely upon the basis of justice to the veteran. The obligation of the Government to the service men to adjust their compensation accrued when the act was passed by Congress and not when the men received their certificates. They should have a right to borrow upon those certificates whenever they are issued, for the Government obligation to make payment, to issue certificates, accrues when the Congress passed that act over the presidential veto some years ago. The law as it now stands makes the date of the issuance the controlling factor and requires that the certificates be outstanding two years before loans can be made upon them. The date of the passage of the act should control. This act corrects that situation.

So it is a measure not of relief to veterans. It is not an unemployment measure. It is a measure of simple justice to the men who hold these certificates as a result of their World War service. Early this session the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and I introduced companion bills that would have accomplished the same purpose this bill does. The authorship of the bill is immaterial. The important and material fact is that the ends to be accomplished by this bill be authorized by law.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this bill merely seeks to do justice to those veterans of the World War who have borrowed up to 50 per cent of their adjusted-service certificates and have been and are still paying 4½ per cent interest, which means that the balance of the certificate will be eaten up by interest by 1945. A year ago the Treasury Department could have issued bonds at 3⅛ per cent. It was never the purpose of the Congress when it passed the adjusted-service certificates act to make money at the expense of the veterans.

This bill should have been enacted into law a year ago and if it had there probably would never have been a bonus march on Washington.

I want to tell you Members of Congress that the veterans back home, not those who have been here marching around Washington, have a justifiable grievance, and they know it, and they know that Congress has been making a profit at their expense upon these certificates.

I am glad this House has finally agreed on a bill to reduce the rate of interest to 3½ per cent so that we can go back home and face the veterans and tell them that it is not the purpose of Congress to make any profit at their expense on the money they have borrowed on the adjusted-service certificates given them by the Government in good faith. We have reduced the rate of interest on all war debts and in some instances down to 1 per cent. I introduced a bill six months ago to reduce the rate of interest on loans made by veterans on their adjusted-service certificates to 3 per cent and likewise a bill to permit veterans to borrow on their certificates within the 2-year period required by law. The Bacharach bill accomplishes both purposes and will provide substantial justice to the veterans and should be adopted by a unanimous vote.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, and I feel that although we were not in agreement on the bill for full payment we can support this measure as just and fair. When we first met in December I introduced a bill removing the 2-year prohibition covering loan privileges, reducing the interest rate to 3 per cent, and providing for full payment to permanently disabled men unable to pursue a substantially gainful occupation. While this bill before us does not go so far, it does give some relief, and it appears to be the only bill we can enact at this time.

Many of our veterans have been hard hit by the depression—including those who for various reasons did not apply at an early date for their adjusted-compensation certificates—and we do not wish to see them discriminated against or penalized in obtaining loans, similar to those obtained by their comrades, just because their certificates are not two years old. And surely it is not the desire of our Government to be unfair in interest charges. When these distressed veterans come to our offices we are prone to advise them to go home, and they should be at home, but how about those who have no homes? I have in mind the case of a man and his wife, here with the army of veterans encamped about Washington, who have been dispossessed. And yet the husband possesses a certificate which, were it not for the 2-year requirement, would permit him to obtain approximately $800, enough to start him definitely on the way to rehabilitation. I am advised that passage of the measure will permit hundreds of these men to go home and try to get somewhere in their home communities. It should prevail.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF TWO PROPOSITIONS

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, while the eighteenth amendment is anomalous in form, the Supreme Court has held it to be a proper constitutional amendment. It must be construed, therefore, as such and not as some other anomalous form of compact, legislation, or declaration of public policy. Construing it as a constitutional amendment, the first question is, Why a constitutional amendment was necessary to confer on the Federal Government power to prohibit the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors; second, against whom such prohibition was intended to run, in view (a) of the powers conferred on the Federal Government, (b) of the wording of the amendment itself, and (c) of the circumstances under which the amendment was enacted?

This memorandum, therefore, will first set out the points in support of proposition 1; second, the points in support of proposition 2; third, the results of such a construction of the eighteenth amendment; fourth, the authorities supporting propositions 1 and 2.

POINTS IN SUPPORT OF PROPOSITION 1

(a) Since the Federal Government has no police powers except those specifically conferred by the Constitution, the eighteenth amendment was necessary to confer upon the Federal Government police powers to prohibit the manufacture, transportation, and sale of liquor within the several States, as distinguished from the manufacture, transportation, and sale of liquor in interstate commerce. As to interstate commerce, the Federal Government already had full powers in this respect under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and had exercised them in the Webb-Kenyon law.

While this memorandum is not concerned primarily with the powers, if any, conferred by the eighteenth amendment on the States, it is to be noted that the Supreme Court itself has construed the eighteenth amendment so far as the States are concerned, as a reservation rather than a grant of power. As a grant of power it holds it at most to free the States from certain limitations of the commerce clause, presumably those limiting the power of the States to restrict importation of interstate or foreign liquor. In the case of the United States v. Lanza (260 U. S. 377, 67 L. Ed. 314), the court says:

> To regard the amendment as the source of power of the States to adopt and enforce prohibition measures, is to take a partial and erroneous view of the matter. Save for some restrictions arising out of the Federal Constitution, chiefly the commerce clause, each State possessed that power in full measure prior to the amendment, and the probable purpose of declaring a concurrent power to be in the States, was to negative any possible inference that, investing the National Government with the power of country-wide prohibition, State powers should be excluded.

(b) The very fact that the powers conferred on the Federal Government by the eighteenth amendment were police powers necessarily excludes any implication that any power was conferred against the States themselves, since police powers are those exercised by a sovereign against its subjects or citizens, and since the police powers in question were those theretofore exclusively exercised by the several States against their respective citizens. The eighteenth amendment, therefore, merely conferred on the Federal Government concurrent power with the several States to prohibit as against the citizens thereof the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquor within those States without conferring on the Federal Government any such powers against the States themselves.

(c) This is corroborated by section 2 of the amendment, providing:

> The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

It would be meaningless and absurd to construe section 2 as conferring concurrent power on a State to enforce the prohibitions of the eighteenth amendment against itself.

(d) While the eighteenth amendment not only confers power but in itself enacts a prohibition, the enactment must be within the limits of the power conferred. Since the powers conferred were police powers, the enactment, in spite of its broad terms, must be construed as an enactment against those subject to police powers, i. e., the citizens of the several States, and not against those wielding such powers, the States themselves.

Moreover, it is an established canon of statutory construction that legislation does not apply to a sovereign unless the sovereign be named; and the prohibitions of the eighteenth amendment do not expressly name the States. Neither can it be contended that the Congress in proposing the eighteenth amendment, or the States in ratifying it, had in mind the manufacture, transportation, or sale of intoxicating liquors by a State itself, since no State ever had been, or was then engaged in such manufacture, transportation, and sale. The eighteenth amendment in this respect must be construed in the light of the existing evils which it was designed to correct, and which were the evils peculiar to the private manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors.

(e) The eighteenth amendment can not be construed as a compact between the United States and the several States against the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors. Waiving the question whether there is constitutional provision for such a compact, the eighteenth amendment lacks the essential element of any compact; that is, consent of all the parties to be affected thereby.

(f) The fact that the eighteenth amendment not only confers power but enacts a prohibition constitutes it a limited rather than a full conference of police powers on the Federal Government, the powers conferred being limited to those incident to prohibition. To have conferred full police powers on the Federal Government the amendment should have conferred power on it to regulate or prohibit the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors. This point is particularly mentioned because of the tendency to consider the fact that the eighteenth amendment not only confers power but enacts a prohibition as in some way enlarging rather than restricting the powers of the Federal Government under it.

POINTS IN SUPPORT OF PROPOSITION 2

(a) The Supreme Court has held that the States, in granting concurrent police powers to the Federal Government, have not surrendered their own police powers. United States v. Lanza, supra.

(b) The Supreme Court has also held that a State can not by contract surrender its own police powers. Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts (97 U. S. 33, 24 L. Ed. 939). It is doubtful whether such powers could be surrendered even by an express constitutional amendment. See brief, Elihu Root, National Prohibition Cases (253 U. S. 350, 64 L. Ed. 946). In any event the eighteenth amendment does not purport to surrender them but merely grants concurrent powers to the Federal Government.

(c) Under its reserved powers a State, irrespective of its power to enter into business generally, would have power in the interests of public health and morals itself to undertake the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, since as shown under proposition 1, the States have conferred on the Federal Government concurrent power only as against the citizens of the several States to prohibit such manufacture, transportation, and sale within those States and have conferred no such powers against the States themselves.

(d) A State in undertaking such manufacture, transportation, and sale might, of course, in any of these respects, act through bona fide agents. It must be conceded that in view of the eighteenth amendment, a State, even under its reserved police powers, would not have power to confer on a citizen or corporation the right to engage in private manufacture, transportation, or sale, or otherwise than as a bona fide agent of the State.

(e) It would seem advisable that should any State undertake itself to manufacture, transport, and sell intoxicating liquors, it should, in enacting appropriate legislation, recite that it acts in the exercise of its reserved police powers in the interests of the health and morals of its citizens, and to eliminate the public corruption and dangers inherent in Federal prohibition.

RESULTS OF CONSTRUCTION CONTENDED FOR

The advantages of the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors by the several States within their own borders, should be obvious whether or not the eighteenth amendment is repealed. It will confine such manufacture, transportation, and sale within the State lines of those States desiring it. If the amendment be not repealed the Federal Government would have full authority under it to prevent the transportation of liquor manufactured by one State into any other State. Even were the amendment repealed it would still be within the power of Congress under the commerce clause to prevent the interstate transportation of such liquor if Congress determined this to be desirable. Indeed, if the eighteenth amendment is repealed, proponents of repeal propose to give Congress express powers in this respect, if it does not already possess them.

Moreover, it should be possible in the manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors by a State, to avoid the evils heretofore incident to private manufacture, transportation, and sale, and it should eliminate the public corruption inherent in any attempt at total prohibition through the Federal Government. While probably there would be some attempt at illicit importation from a State engaged in such manufacture into a State forbidding it, such illicit importation would be comparatively easy to control by the cooperation of the two States concerned and the Federal Government. In short, it would restore to the several States the right to regulate their purely internal affairs in this respect, leaving those States desiring such manufacture, transportation, and sale, the right to engage in it, while still affording Federal protection to those States opposed to it.

Perhaps one of the strongest arguments in favor of this construction is that such manufacture, transportation, and sale by a State within a State would not be subject to Federal taxation but would constitute an important source of State revenue.

Finally, should one or more States act upon this construction of the eighteenth amendment and engage in such manufacture, transportation, and sale, it would seem, in view of the present state of public opinion, that the probability of a serious attempt at Federal interference should be remote. Even were it attempted it is not clear now it could practicably be undertaken. Neither is it unreasonable to hope that since the Supreme Court has never passed on this question it would not be unaffected by the change in public psychology, and under the construction contended for might well restrain such Federal interference.

NOTES ON COURT DECISIONS

The powers conferred by the Federal Government by the eighteenth amendment are police powers. (United States v. Cohen (D. C. Missouri, 1920), 268 F. 420; Ex parte Crookshank (D. C. Calif., 1921), 269 F. 980. Appeal dismissed, 267 U. S. 664, 66 L. Ed. 424.)

Curiously enough the Supreme Court in construing the eighteenth amendment has not, so far as determinable, exactly defined the nature of the powers conferred by the amendment on the Federal Government. In the National Prohibition Cases (253 U. S. 350, 64 L. Ed. 946), Vigilotti v. Pennsylvania (258 U. S. 403, 66 L. Ed. 686), United States v. Lanza (260 U. S. 377, 67 L. Ed. 314), the court was chiefly concerned with the construction of the second section of the eighteenth amendment conferring concurrent powers on the United States and the several States. In all these decisions, particularly the Lanza and Vigilotti cases, the court expressly recognized that the prohibition powers of the States were police powers. It follows, although the court did not so expressly hold, that the concurrent powers conferred on the United States must be police powers.

The statement in the Lanza case at page 381 that—> the first section of the amendment took from the States all power to authorize acts falling within its prohibition—and general statements to the same effect in the other cases, do not militate against the construction contended for, since the Supreme Court has not defined what are "acts falling within its prohibition." As has already been noted, the prohibitions of the eighteenth amendment can not go beyond the powers conferred on the Federal Government, and those powers being police powers, are powers inherently exercisable against citizens of States, and not against the States themselves.

In the preparation of this memorandum counsel has not attempted to examine all of the innumerable cases in which the Supreme Court has passed on the Volstead Act as distinguished from the eighteenth amendment. Whether in any of those cases the Supreme Court has more closely defined the nature of the powers conferred on the Federal Government by the eighteenth amendment, is, therefore, impossible to say. An examination of the more important of these cases discloses no such definition. Furthermore, it is confidently believed that the Supreme Court could not define the powers conferred on the Federal Government as other than police powers, and that the Supreme Court at least has never undertaken to say that such powers are exercisable against a State, as distinguished from citizens of a State.

INTEREST ON SOLDIERS' LOANS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, it has been my observation that the Treasury recently has borrowed money at 3 per cent in amounts which should be sufficient for the payment of current loans on the adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans. I do not believe, even in times like these, that we should ask those men to pay a rate of interest higher than that paid by the Government for which they fought in 1917 and 1918. For this reason I favor and am supporting the Senate bill which reduces the interest on these loans to 3 per cent, rather than the House bill which reduces the interest rate to 3½ per cent.

LEST WE FORGET

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, the plan of President Hoover and the Republican leaders is to shift attention from the tragic failures of the present national administration, and to this end, aided by the great metropolitan newspapers, they launched a nation-wide campaign to discredit Congress. But the RECORD speaks clearly and convincingly proves that—

First. Congress is the most economical branch of our Government and that the greatest waste and extravagance is in the executive departments and in the boards, bureaus, and commissions, over all of which President Hoover presides, but whose wasteful expenditures of public funds the President has made no effort to restrain.

Second. The present Congress cut appropriations for next year $690,379,933 below the appropriations for the preceding year, and then by the economy bill reduced salaries $150,000,000, making a total saving of $840,379,933 as compared with the expense for last year.

Third. The present Congress not only cut appropriations more than $840,000,000 below the appropriations for last year, but this Congress reduced the ordinary expenses of the Government $36,524,021 below the expenses for 1927. To this sum should be added the $150,000,000 saved by the economy bill, which makes the Government expenses for next year $186,524,021 less than the Government expenses for last year.

Fourth. The present Congress reduced the appropriations for the coming year $174,000,000 below the recommendations of President Hoover and the estimates of his Director of the Budget.

Fifth. In its efforts to reduce expenses, Congress did not have the wholehearted cooperation of President Hoover and his Cabinet heads. The Cabinet officers vigorously opposed the efforts of Congress to reduce appropriations for their respective departments. If President Hoover had been very much interested in reducing Government expenses he would have prevented his Cabinet officers from going before the Appropriations Committee and fighting these reductions. Moreover, when Congress endeavored to consolidate the War and Navy Departments, which would have meant a saving from fifty to one hundred million dollars annually, President Hoover not only vigorously opposed such consolidation, but sent his private secretary on the floor of the House to lobby with Republican Members and defeat the proposal for such consolidation.

Sixth. Under the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover administrations the number of Federal employees has been increased over 200,000, and during all these years neither of these Presidents made any worth-while effort to prevent this enormous increase in public expenditures, and President Hoover was as "still as a mouse" about economy until the Democratic House and a rapidly growing public demand forced him to recommend a "milk-and-water" economy program. The Government expenses for the ensuing year will be nearly $1,000,000,000 less than last year, and the credit for this saving is primarily due to the Democratic House that initiated and put over this economy program.

GETTING ACQUAINTED WITH THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, there is much misunderstanding among our good citizens concerning certain subjects. I want to repeat and answer some questions that are most often asked.

Question. Do any of the taxes paid to county or city treasurers go to the support of the National Government?

Answer. No. All taxes on lands, houses, business property, personal property, or for schools, roads, and so forth, that are paid to county and city treasurers are levied, collected, and expended within the State. Such taxes are not and under the Constitution can not be controlled in any way by Congress and not one penny of such taxes goes to the support of the National Government.

Question. Do National Government officials and employees pay an income tax?

Answer. Yes. Senators, Congressmen, and all employees of the National Government pay exactly the same Federal income tax as a private citizen with the same income. In order that there might be no question about this, the Congress several years ago passed a law stating specifically that salaries of United States Senators and Congressmen should be taxed.

Question. Did Congressmen reduce their own salaries this year?

Answer. Yes. Congressmen and Senators cut their own salaries 10 per cent and their travel and stationery allowance 25 per cent.

Question. Does the Government do free printing for Congressmen?

Answer. No. The Government Printing Office collects the full cost of every line printed for each and every Congressman.

Question. What about the franking privilege?

Answer. In the transaction of official business Congressmen receive and answer anywhere from 40 to 400 letters daily. This correspondence covers a wide variety of subjects such as pending legislation, public and private, relating to veterans' cases of all kinds, to immigration cases, to pensions, to public works, such as rivers and harbors, public buildings, and the like, in short, to every subject which contacts our people with the National Government. Constituents expect and have a right to inquire into and be given information upon these subjects. There is also a demand for Government publications.

This demand covers a wide range, from copies of bills pending in Congress to copies of bulletins issued upon many subjects, copies of committee hearings, Government reports on rivers and harbors, railroads, national forests, national parks, public lands, legal opinions, reports of departments and of commissions, agricultural Year Books, claims, foreign and domestic, and, in short, publications covering the entire ramifications of the National Government that can only be procured at the source of publication in Washington. The franking privilege is primarily for the benefit of our citizens. It would be very annoying for constituents to inclose return postage, and nothing would be saved in the long run. One hundred and twenty-five million citizens are served in this way by 531 Senators and Representatives at an average cost to the Post Office Department of less than a thousand dollars per year per Member. The congressional franking privilege for all these purposes amounts to one fifteen-hundredth of postal expenditures.

FOREIGN-DEBT CANCELLATION

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the clever scheme which has just been agreed to by European diplomats at the Lausanne Conference to cancel reparations and the cost of the World War might look very good to the international bankers and others who are more interested in their own financial matters than in the welfare of the American taxpayer. In my opinion, this united proposal on the part of debtor nations is simply a scheme hatched up by cunning foreign statesmen and international bankers to unload the cost of the war on the American people.

Underneath the surface of the Lausanne agreement appears a secret gentlemen's agreement amongst the European diplomats that their official compact to cancel reparations is contingent upon action by the United States Government to cancel the nearly $12,000,000,000 of foreign debts held by our country. Virtually all of this huge amount was loaned by the Wilson administration after the signing of the armistice and represents money honestly raised from the American people through the sale of Liberty bonds.

I opposed the cancellation of nearly $10,000,000,000 of foreign debts in 1926, and I am unalterably opposed to cancellation at this or any future time. The debtor nations have nearly 60 years in which to pay their obligations to this country, which is a sufficient time in which to take care of these honest debts to the American people. Our Government has already canceled 50 per cent of the obligations due us as a result of loans made during and after the war.

While it is doubtful if we could ever collect any of the outstanding debts, I would, nevertheless, oppose cancellation because of the trickery and subterfuge resorted to by the European diplomats and international bankers to fleece the American people.

Most of our difficulties of to-day are traced to the World War. If the people of this country stand blindly aside and permit unscrupulous international politicians to unload the cost of the war on the people of this country, it will be the most exasperating outrage perpetrated upon the people of any country.

I am also opposed to any scheme which calls for a cancellation of the foreign debt under the guise of a reduction of foreign armies and navies. Why should the American taxpayer be called upon to pay for foreign favor along this line when we, as a Nation, have always led the world in movements for peace, and when we know that any agreement to limit armament by foreign powers will be tied up by secret gentlemen's agreements at the expense of this country? We had one experience about 10 years ago when this country scrapped hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of battleships and the foreign powers simply destroyed blue prints.

The experience of the people of the United States in dealing with foreign countries has been very disastrous. International bankers have unloaded nearly $30,000,000,000 worth of foreign bonds upon our citizens, most of which are now worthless. The responsibility for this gigantic steal lies with the international bankers, and I feel that the time has now come when they should be eliminated from the picture. They are parasites on society, seeking only gain for themselves and their clients. They have left the American people holding the bag and have taken the profits for themselves and their foreign conspirators.

In the future it would be well for Americans to remember the disastrous times from 1917 to 1932 and to learn to say "no" when it comes to any dealing with international bankers and foreign entanglements.

ARCHIBALD ROOSEVELT SHOULD GIVE THE FACTS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I inserted a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in answer to the petition of Archibald Roosevelt's so-called economy committee. In the statement I showed that Archie was in no position to complain about the Government being liberal with the veterans; that he was the part owner and an officer of the Roosevelt Steamship Co.; that this company received a contract from the Government to carry ocean mail; that the first few months of this contract this company received a subsidy from the Government amounting to $779,004; the statement also showed how Archie was successfully used by Harry Sinclair in the Teapot Dome negotiations; that he was given a big salary and raised several times, although Sinclair later testified that he was not worth 15 cents at any kind of work. Archie has issued a statement denying that he was a part owner of the Roosevelt Steamship Co., but admits that he once acted as temporary director of the company, but never received any profits.

DIRECTOR OF COMPANY LAST 12 YEARS

I have examined the Directory of Directors for the years 1921 to 1931, inclusive. The following information is given for that period of time:

ARCHIBALD ROOSEVELT

1921–22: Vice president, secretary, and director of Roosevelt Steamship Co., page 705.
1923–24: Vice president and director of Roosevelt Steamship Co., page 787.
1925–26: Same as above, page 776.
1927–28: Director of Roosevelt Steamship Co., page 808.
1929–30: Same as above, page 808.
1930–31: Director, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co.; director, Roosevelt Steamship Co., page 837.

SUMMARY (ARCHIBALD ROOSEVELT)

Director, Roosevelt Steamship Co., 1921–22 to date.
Director, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., 1930–31 only.

WAS HE DUMMY DIRECTOR?

The records disclose that Archie was a director of the Roosevelt Steamship Co. for many years and until the present time or the last report. He says that he was only a "temporary" director and received none of the profits of the company. He was a director when the Postmaster General was persuaded to give his company a subsidy for 10 years.

WALL STREET INTERESTS

International and Wall Street bankers needed some one to fight the veterans for them; they selected Archie. No doubt they considered the use of the Roosevelt name would be valuable to them. If they were familiar with Harry Sinclair's testimony before the Teapot Dome investigating committee in regard to the value of Archie's services, they doubtless considered his name—Roosevelt—his only asset to the cause they were promoting.

ATTITUDE OF CONGRESS TOWARD BUSINESS CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. STULL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me at a meeting of the Rotary Club of Johnstown, Pa., June 29, 1932:

Approximately eight weeks have passed since I assumed my duties as your Representative in Congress from the Cambria County district. It is but natural for you, on an occasion of this kind, to want to know something of my labors in your behalf while serving as your Representative; but if I were to make candid reply to that inquiry, it might be concluded with the frank statement that most of my time has been consumed in endeavoring to find out just how and why the wheels of the National Legislature go around. So, instead of attempting to justify my incumbency, it might be more to the point if I were to discuss some of the outstanding phases of the problem which confronts practically every individual of the Nation to-day, the solution of which is most eagerly and earnestly sought. It would be superfluous for me to even mention the name of this problem, for we all have become so obsessed with it that to apply the most descriptive term is taboo. Therefore, I will merely refer in this short talk to the matter of business conditions in the United States and what action has been taken by Congress with reference thereto.

In approaching any problem, as in the treatment of a disease, it is always advisable to determine, if possible, the causes of the trouble; yet in an endeavor to locate the cause of the present difficulties one is confronted with a variety of opinion and with little agreement thereon. In reading a little pamphlet a few days ago, I ran across this story, which is a recital of a lady who wrote to a town editor: "Why do we have hard times?" The editor answered, "Lady, hard times is a period when people quit feeding the cow and wonder why she gives less milk."

The primary or underlying cause of present conditions is quite likely the same as those of former depressions. We recall that since the Civil War we have had a number of major business depessions, the most outstanding of which were those of 1873, 1893, 1907, and 1921. It might also be mentioned that in 1913 we had conditions that presaged a very serious stringency, but by reason of the great industrial expansion following the outbreak of the war in Europe, grave results were averted.

Of the panics mentioned, those of 1873 and 1893, each continuing for a period of four years, are the only ones comparable to the present stagnation. The panic of 1873 was brought to a close largely by reason of three successive large crops in the United States at a time when all other grain-producing countries of the world had small crops. The panic of 1893 was aided in coming to a close by reason of our entrance into war with Spain. No specific act of the Government, however, was resorted to to bring the country out of the depression in any of these cases. It remained for the present emergency for the country to call loudly upon its legislative and executive branches of the Government to perform the herculean task of bringing back prosperity after business had fallen into the doldrums. It might be questioned, of course, whether or not such procedure is a proper function of the Federal Government.

But in these later years it has become so much the custom for the people to look to their Government for relief in every time of stress that it is impossible for the chosen agents of the people to escape the responsibility thus thrust upon them.

The people, including high financiers, bankers, business men, and captains of industry, having woefully failed to keep the machine functioning and having, as a last resort, put the whole thing up to Congress, now complain bitterly because that body, after laboring since the beginning of December, has failed to apply the magic touch. Even now, while severely criticizing the ineptitude of the Congress, the country is demanding that Congress throw up the sponge and adjourn. Despite the unjust criticism of their individual and joint efforts, the Members of Congress, of both branches, are nevertheless devoting their best talents to the job in hand and it is confidently asserted that in the main these Members are doing a yeoman service and are patriotically giving their best to the country.

Many measures have been introduced in Congress having for their purpose the revival of business as well the correction of the unemployment situation. Quite naturally some of these have little merit, while others have received the most careful consideraton of Congress and a few of them have been enacted into law. Still others are in the course of legislative action and, it is hoped, will be passed before the adjournment of the present session.

Adverting for a moment to the most apparent outstanding causes of our present situation, I think it can well be conceded that as a Nation we did not fully appreciate the gravity of the debt incurred by reason of our participation in the World War. In 1916, the year before our entry into the war, the Nation's gross bonded debt was less than a billion and a quarter dollars and in the year succeeding the cessation of hostilities, 1919, it had reached nearly twenty-five and one-half billion dollars. During the succeeding years it has been reduced to approximately $18,000,000,000.

Despite this enormous burden of debt upon the National Government, with its accompanying heavy burden of interest, the reconstruction period after the war was so hectic and productive of such enormous profits everyone seemed to think that a new era had been reached and that no depressions would ever recur. As a nation we entered into a orgy of luxurious and expensive living, and with the surpluses acquired from time to time we began pyramiding in security investments. Everyone got into the stock market for easy money. Not only that, we were not satisfied with spending the money as we got it, but, following the lead of the National Government adopted under the stress of war financing and with the success of the flotation of huge bond issues still fresh in our minds, individuals, business concerns, and financial institutions began pledging future earnings to build still greater fortunes and establishments. Indeed, we appeared to have embarked upon a steadily ascending spiral, and there was little or no thought of a return trip. We had forgotten that old axiom of our boyhood days, that "whatever goes up is bound to come down."

Concomitant with the expansion of business, we had an enormous increase in the wealth of the country; that is to say, we appeared to have more money, but, strangely enough, in the period from 1917 to the present time the amount of money in circulation has not varied greatly. In none of those years has the circulation of currency ever fallen below $4,000,000,000, nor has it exceeded about five and one-half billion dollars. In fact, it has averaged about $5,000,000,000 during each of the years of that period.

The stock of money in the United States, counting Treasury reserves and money of all kinds, during a similar period ranged from five and one-half billion dollars to eight and one-half billion dollars; that is, speaking in terms of actual cash. But we did not depend alone upon this cash money to do business; we had another kind which passed as money but which, in reality, was only credit. This credit money was in the form of bank deposits. Prior to the crash in 1929 physical money—that is, actual cash—added to these credits or bank deposits amounted to $60,000,000,000. To-day it does not exceed $45,000,000,000. So that by reason of the contraction of business credits we have lost $15,000,000,000, which is absolutely gone.

We might ask how money actually disappears in this fashion. If I owe you a debt and pay that debt in cash, the money still exists and there is no change in the total amount of cash; or if I have the cash in the bank and give you a check to pay my debt, my credit is merely transferred to your deposit credit and my balance is reduced by the amount that yours is increased. Here, again, there is no change in the amount of cash. But if I borrow money from the bank and give the bank my note, the amount of my note or loan is entered to my credit in my account. Now, when I draw a check to pay the bank, the amount of that check goes out of existence. That money disappears. The only existence it ever had was in my deposit book and on the books of the bank. This procedure also explains the enormous gains in bank deposits. Thus, during the past three years, more than $15,000,000,000 has been wiped out in that way. People have been paying their debts and contracting the currency and our deposit currency has been reduced to $45,000,000,000.

Another element that goes to the stagnation of trade is the reduced velocity of the currency. During the boom years our deposits—that is to say, the $60,000,000,000—were turned over at the rate of about twenty-five times per year. That has now been cut in half, and the turnover is only about thirteen times per year. To get a better picture of that situation we have only to compare the total volume of trade during the two periods. When we had $60,000,000,000 turning twenty-five times a year it represented an annual turnover of $1,500,000,000,000, whereas $45,000,000,000 turning thirteen times represents a total turnover of only $585,000,000,000, a loss of 41 per cent. The sad part about it is, or has been, that the contraction has been steadily going on.

With the depletion of our finances and our lessening ability to pay we are now astounded to find what is on the debit side of our ledger. We find that the total indebtedness of individuals, business concerns, municipalities, States, and Nation aggregate more than $200,000,000,000. Prior to 1929 the physical capital of the United States was only $360,000,000,000 at its highest peak, and by reason of the depletion of values that has now been reduced to about not much more than $180,000,000,000. That presents a rather serious-looking balance sheet. The truth of the matter is that as a people we are barely solvent. On this debt we had an annual interest bill of about $7,000,000,000 and an annual tax bill of about $13,000,000,000. The stock-market crash has resulted in a loss to the American people of about $70,000,000,000 of pyramided securities, paid for largely with borrowed money. So, that was the picture. After the individuals and the banks and the captains of industry had failed they turned to Congress with this order: Reimburse us for our $70,000,000,000 losses, reduce the annual tax burden of $13,000,000,000, and immediately give jobs to the eight or nine million men whose jobs were lost through the crash. That was certainly some order to give to the legislative branch of the Government.

As stated before, many expedients have been suggested, among others the proposed increase in the amount of currency of nearly two and one-half billion dollars with which to pay the adjusted-service certificates of the soldiers of the late war. The measures proposing this increase in the currency for the purpose indicated experienced a stormy career in Congress. The Patman bill, providing for the payment of these certificates in full, was the first bill introduced in the House during the present session and was designated as H. R. 1. This bill, together with 19 others of similar character, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, which conducted hearings from April 11 to April 29 and on May 2 and 3 and submitted an adverse report to the House on the 7th of May. The report of the hearings of this committee covered 841 pages of testimony. Although this report put an end to the measure for the time being, its proponent succeeded, by means of petition, in securing favorable action to bring the bill before the House for consideration. Probably no measure brought before the present session has brought forth so much discussion and the debate was cut short by the untimely and tragic death of the Hon. Edward E. Eslick, who was stricken on the floor while making a speech in favor of the bill. The termination of the debate, however, did not prevent Members from expressing their views on the measure. Many pages of the RECORD are covered with the extension of remarks on this particular legislation.

It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of this measure other than to deal with the amendment to the original bill—that to pay the certificates with new currency—also the last-minute amendment submitted but a short time before the bill was put up for passage, providing for the issuance of bonds in an amount similar to the proposed issue of currency; that is, bonds to be placed in the hands of the Federal reserve bank and to be issued by it when and as, in the judgment of the board, it became necessary to stabilize the currency.

Along this line it might be well to quote the concluding paragraphs of the majority report of the Ways and Means Committee having the bill in charge. The committee says: "There is absolutely no shortage of currency; there is in existence all the currency we need."

"What we need is a restoration of confidence in order to get back to normal in the United States. First of all, we must balance our Budget by reducing the expense of the Government and by levying new taxes. We must restore the confidence of the people of the United States in our own Government first of all, and the printing of $2,400,000 of fiat money and its distribution will not inspire confidence in the stability of our currency or in the stability of our Government."

It is upon these considerations that the measure was lost, both in the House and in the Senate. It was not so much a question of whether the soldiers were entitled to the payment of their certificates at this time as it was that the country was in no position to make the payment without catastrophe.

It has already been pointed out that the bulk of our trading need is not actual cash but credit. In fact, the actual cash in circulation is nearly a billion dollars more now than it was in 1929. It was increased by the amount of $900,000,000 in 1931, for the purpose of paying the 50 per cent loan on soldiers' certificates; and though at that time heralded as a cure for the depression, the increased circulation caused scarcely a ripple on the financial sea. In my opinion, merely adding to the volume of the currency would not cure the trouble, but, on the contrary, would aggravate it. An inflation of currency at this time could not do otherwise than cheapen our money.

Well, you will say, what has Congress done on that job? I think one of the most outstanding accomplishments was the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Congress appropriated $500,000,000 toward the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and gave authority to that corporation to borrow on bond issues an additional billion and a half dollars. The money advanced by the Government is to be repaid, and it is calculated that the corporation, briefly referred to as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, will be self-supporting, if not profitable. I think it can be generally conceded that the support given to the banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation definitely checked the wave of failures that has started among those institutions. In fact, it saved the banking system of the country.

As to the work of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, no better authority can be found than its former president, Gen. Charles G. Dawes, who was called as a witness in the hearings on the Patman bill. At the time of the giving of his testimony on April 21 the corporation had been functioning about 11 weeks, and during that period it had authorized loans to 1,520 banks and trust companies in the amount of more than $243,000,000, of which amount ten million had already been repaid. These figures did not include loans of approximately $6,000,000 authorized in connection with the reorganization or liquidation of closed banks. The success of the work of the corporation was indicated in the fact that in the 71 days which preceded its institution 756 banks suspended in the United States, while in the 71 days succeeding the opening of business by the corporation only 182 banks suspended, involving deposits of only one-sixth as much as in the preceding 71 days. And, in addition to this, 79 failed banks, with thirty-six and one-half million dollars deposits, have reopened. Furthermore, the withdrawal of deposits had been stopped, and hoarded money to the extent of $250,000,000 has been returned to the banks.

Touching the criticism that only the large banks had been favored, General Dawes points out that 69.2 per cent of the banks which have borrowed money from the corporation are located in towns of less than 5,000 population, and 84.6 per cent of the borrowing banks are located in towns of 25,000 population or less. Only 5.3 per cent of the money loaned was to banks located in cities of 1,000,000 population or over.

During this period of time loans were authorized to 20 railroad companies aggregating seventy-seven and one-half million dollars. At the close of business April 19 the corporation had approved advances to 98 building and loan associations in the total amount of $17,326,748, also nearly twelve million to 28 insurance companies located throughout the country. In his testimony General Dawes points out that "the reason why Congress authorized loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to railroads, as disclosed by the discussions in Congress, was not only for the protection of railroad corporations as the backbone of our transportation system and as employers of hundreds of thousands of men but for the protection as well of the trustee institutions of this country, including insurance companies and savings banks, owning the securities of railroads, in which institutions and their normal functioning the great public has a direct interest."

In addition to the foregoing, the corporation has authorized loans to joint-stock land banks, livestock-credit corporations, agricultural-credit corporations, and mortgage-loan companies in the aggregate number of 24 and in the aggregate amount of $14,400,000.

Summarizing, General Dawes says: "The corporation has authorized, in the brief period from February 2 to April 19, loans to 1,757 institutions aggregating $370,437,802, of which $285,456,521 has been disbursed to the borrowing institutions. Repayments during this period aggregated $11,384,263. The corporation has 33 loan agencies distributed over the country for the purpose of receiving applications for loans and making recommendations to the board at Washington, and every section of the United States was represented in the loans that have been made."

The set-up of the corporation is such that it is found adaptable to many other reconstructive plans, and its duties are being expanded continually to meet new needs of financing.

In addition to the foregoing, Congress has greatly reduced the appropriation bills for the operation of the Government departments, and is now endeavoring to expedite the passage of a relief bill for the unemployed by means of loans to the several States and to business institutions for the promotion of self-liquidating works and projects. A bill has also passed the House providing for large loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to building and loan associations. This measure is known as the home loan bank bill, and it is hoped will become a law.

Notwithstanding the passage in the House of the Garner "pork-barrel" bill for the construction of large numbers of post offices throughout the country and other public works, there appears little sympathy in Congress for such a project. It is expected that some compromise measure may be made up by a combination of the Garner bill and the Wagner bill which, in all probability, will carry provisions for unemployment relief.

In its efforts to balance the Budget, Congress passed a billion-dollar tax bill. Judging by press comments and the expressions of people on the street, this tax bill is not at all popular; but judging from the number of requests to have a copy of the act supplied to them, one might conclude that its circulation would rank with one of the best sellers. The tax bill will be found increasingly unpopular, and, in my opinion, most of those persons who severely criticized and strenuously opposed the passage of a sales tax will eventually come to admit that such a tax is preferable to the one that Congress finally adopted.

That, in brief, is what Congress has attempted to do to relieve the situation; and while people, as indicated at the outset of this talk, are prone to look to the Government for relief, the end of our decline is not in sight unless the people themselves earnestly tackle the job and we have no reason to despair. There are more than 120,000,000 of us and we have often boasted, in season and out, that we are the greatest people on earth and that there is no job too big for us to do. There is much justification for this boast, for though notwithstanding the fact that we represent only 6 per cent of the population of the world, we do things on a larger and greater scale than do our neighbors of other countries.

Senator CAPPER, in a recent radio address, pointed out what this 6 per cent of the world's population was doing the year before the panic of 1929 started. It consumed 15 per cent of the wheat consumed in the entire world; 23 per cent of all the sugar; 51 per cent, more than half, of the coffee drunk in the world; used 26 per cent of the cotton; 72 per cent of the silk; 17 per cent of the wool; 66 per cent of the rubber; 43 per cent of the pig iron; 36 per cent of the lead; 35 per cent of the zinc; 46 per cent of the tin; 39 per cent of the coal; 61 per cent of the petroleum; 35 per cent of the water power; and 40 per cent of the electrical energy.

This 6 per cent of the population of the world owned three-fourths of the autos in the world; used 60 per cent of all the telephones; sent 25 per cent of all the telegrams; mailed 35 per cent of all the mail delivered all over the world; and delivered 38 per cent of the freight tonnages. To-day, there are enough foodstuffs in the United States in storage to last us a year, enough clothing to last us a year, and apparently inexhaustible sources of heat and light power. So much for what we have done and can do again.

I have thus briefly, in the short time allotted me, endeavored to throw some light on the situation. Some of you, possibly many of you, will not agree with what I have said; but I think if you will take the time to seriously reflect upon how we, as individuals, as business concerns, as municipalities and as States, and finally as a nation, have proceeded recklessly to go into debt without any concern for the future or of our own ability to pay, I think you will agree that the punishment we are now taking is not wholly undeserved; and, too, it might be added that it is incumbent upon us to get our house in order and not to hand down to our children a defunct Government and a worthless currency. It may also teach us that wars are much too costly and not to be entered into without great provocation. And, finally, we may have come to recognize the truth of the lesson which the pioneers of the country and our fathers so painstakingly tried to teach us—that the things which endure are those that come as the fruit of earnest toil and that unrestrained speculation can only bring distress.

In true American spirit we are going to throw off the fetters that bind us and again dig in and by sheer force of our individual and combined effort again attain to the heights we have lost the while.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE STATEMENT RELEASED FROM THE WHITE HOUSE BY THE PRESIDENT AS TO THE EFFECT OF THE RELIEF BILL

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the statement issued by the President as to the effect of the relief bill is a remarkable document indeed; it bristles with errors.

THE PORK-BARREL INFECTION

The President insists that what he calls the "pork-barrel" features of the bill are eliminated. As a matter of fact, the "pork-barrel" features are there. The bill as it stands is a real "pork-barrel" bill. It provides for public works to the amount of over $320,000,000. Money can be expended on river and harbor projects, flood-control projects, and public buildings, but it can only be expended on such projects as may be designated by the President's subordinates, and, of course, that means the President, and it can only be expended in the event that the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that there is that much money in the Treasury available or that it can be obtained on reasonable terms. In other words, a national campaign is opening and it is conceivable that part of this money, or all of it, can be released for these purposes in such localities and at such times as may help the Republican national candidates. Of course, the money can be obtained on reasonable terms. The Treasury is now borrowing money at less than 1 per cent per annum.

In his speeches prior to his election and during his campaign, the President declared himself to be in favor of public works for the relief of unemployment and insisted that a billion dollars could be expended for that purpose. Nothing like this sum has been expended in the three years of President Hoover's term of office. Not over one-half of that amount has been appropriated for public-works purposes. We carried in the Garner plan bill, which I introduced, provisions for a public-works program in entire harmony with the President's recent utterances, and nothing has been done to change conditions except that 8,000,000 more men are out of employment.

HIGHWAY APPROPRIATION

The bill carries an appropriation of $120,000,000, which provides for advances to the States for highways. When we passed this bill through the House not long ago the President denounced it as an indefensible "pork-barrel'" measure. He now has signed the bill containing the expenditure of this money for this purpose. This appropriation it not subject to a veto by the President and Secretary of the Treasury. It remains in the bill as a measure of relief for unemployment for the reason alone that it would have been impossible to get the President's relief bill through the House without it.

THE PUBLICITY CLAUSE

The President insists that "the possible destructive effect" upon credit institutions by the so-called publicity clause has been neutralized by the declaration of the Senate leaders "that this provision can not be made public by the clerks of the Senate and the House of Representatives until ordered by the Congress in session."

Not long ago in a statement issued by the President he agreed to this provision and said that the Democratic House must take the responsibility. I at once issued a statement, which was confirmed by the Speaker of the House, that we would take the responsibility. He now insists that this information is to remain confidential until the convening of the next Congress. In other words, while the reports are to be made every month, people are not to know during the progress of the campaign what has been done with the enormous amount of money contributed in the first instance by pledging the credit of the Government, and for which every taxpayer in the United States is liable.

The act which has passed carries no such possibilities. These reports, when they are filed, are public documents; any citizen has the right to inspect them and any newspaper has the right to publish them. Not long ago we passed an act requiring reports as to campaign expenditures and campaign contributions. The same argument might be made that these reports can not be made public except on the express authority of Congress. I undertake to say that if the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate refuse to permit an inspection during the vacation of Congress of these reports they will be guilty of a serious malfeasance and may be held to account for it when Congress convenes again in December. People have a right to know whether this money is going to be used in such a way as to influence the election.

There is, of course, no reason whatever in requiring these reports to be made monthly unless they are to be made public. They might as well be made upon the convening of each session of Congress if the construction placed upon the law by the Senate and by some of the Senators is correct. They are in no sense of a confidential nature.

SELF-LIQUIDATING PROJECTS

The bill carries just as much money as the Garner plan bill, except that at the instance of the President a large amount of it is to be expended on what he calls "self-liquidating projects." As the administration of this act proceeds, I am anxious to see how many self-liquidating projects will be developed in the United States. When self-liquidating projects are referred to, attention is always called to the Holland Tunnel, connecting New Jersey with New York City. This self-liquidating project has paid, but there are five crossings from New Jersey to New York City. Four of them are bridges intended to be self-liquidating. The four bridges have failed absolutely and they are now being carried by the Holland Tunnel. It is proposed to construct another subway under the river in addition to the Holland Tunnel, and because the Holland Tunnel is a success it is contended that this additional tunnel will be a success.

I undertake to say that no more people will cross from New Jersey into New York City or from New York City into New Jersey than now even if another subway under the river is constructed. Another subway under the river would be simply an additional charge on the Holland Tunnel and the chances are that neither the Holland Tunnel nor the four bridges and one additional tunnel would be self-liquidating if the additional tunnel is built.

It is insisted that irrigation projects can be developed which will be self-liquidating. I never heard of an irrigation project that was self-liquidating to any degree. The Government has 37 of them now on its hands and they have paid back none of the appropriations made for them. We do not need additional irrigation projects to bring more marginal lands under cultivation. We have too much land under cultivation now, and if any more of these projects are financed by the Government farmers of the country have the right to know it, and this is one reason for the publicity of these reports.

A GIGANTIC CENTRALIZED BANKING BUSINESS

The President states that the provision for the establishment of a gigantic centralized banking business has been eliminated. As a matter of fact, on his initiative the greatest bank in the history of nations has been established with a capitalization of $2,000,000,000 originally, to which we have added on his initiative $1,500,000,000 more, but under the restrictions placed by him and as a result of his veto of the bill which contained the Garner plan method, this gigantic banking institution is to operate only for the benefit of railroads, banks, and insurance companies. We tried to make it operate in favor of municipalities and corporations and individuals, but the President has succeeded in defeating this feature. At the present time banks will not loan to individuals and corporations or municipalities who can furnish ample security, for the reason that they must keep their funds liquid during the present Republican depression, in order that depositors who have no confidence in this administration can get their money if they want it at any time. They keep their funds liquid in order to avoid runs. There can be no runs on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. There are no depositors there who can take out their money; therefore the provision in the Garner plan bill. The Garner plan bill contemplated a restoration of prosperity by beginning at the bottom and restoring the buying power of individuals and corporations, and this is where we must begin if prosperity is ever restored. This hope, however, has been killed by the President.

The President, however, by advocating and agreeing to the so-called Glass amendment, has made it apparently possible for individuals and corporations to borrow directly from the Federal reserve system. If this operates, I would like to know whether or not this does not constitute a gigantic centralized banking business. Of course, the President now can prevent these loans—through the Secretary of the Treasury and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank he can make these loans to selected individuals.

In other words, they can be made during the coming campaign for political purposes, and this is another reason for publicity of the reports made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bill as it stands is a gigantic "port-barrel" bill which may be administered during the coming campaign in such a way as to help out the Republican national ticket, and this kind of assistance can extend to Republican candidates for Congress as well.

LOANS TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE

The President calls attention to the broadening of the powers of the corporation in the loans it can make to assist agriculture. He states that this should materially improve the condition of the farmers. These provisions for the exportation of agriculture surpluses were contained in the original Garner plan bill which I introduced. The only material modification made consists of the fact that we were compelled to eliminate from the bill the provisions which would have disposed of the one year's surplus of cotton we have on hand. This was eliminated at the demand of Senators and Representatives of the cotton States, but it was really eliminated on account of the false impressions created by the cotton mills and cotton exchanges. The cotton mills, of course, want cotton as cheap as they can get it, and the cotton exchanges want to continue collecting their commissions. They do not want the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to dispose of surplus cotton in such a way as to deprive them of their commissions. I am sorry it was necessary to eliminate cotton from the bill. We have a year's supply of cotton on hand and another crop coming on, and at the expiration of the present crop year we will have another year's supply on hand. As to the other agricultural products, it will work, if the President wants it to work, and I infer from his press releases that he does, but for this feature in the bill the President can not claim credit.

INFLATION AND PRICE FIXING

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Glass-Borah amendment and the proposed Goldsborough-Steagall amendment to the home loan bank bill, it is my purpose to give to the House some facts which have not been brought out and which I believe will reveal the possibilities, if not the certainties, which would follow upon the adoption of these plans.

The Glass-Borah amendment proposes that all United States bonds of a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent or less be made eligible as the basis for the issuance of currency by the national banks on the same basis that they now issue currency against 2 per cent consols. This leaves the first limitation upon the issuance of such currency at the total of such bonds outstanding.

The House has been given the impression that approximately $1,000,000,000 worth of currency could be issued on the basis of this bill. The membership doubtless will be surprised to know that in addition to the three-quarters of a billion dollars' worth of 2 per cent consols there are outstanding $3,173,000,000 worth of additional bonds against which this amendment would permit the issuance of national-bank note currency.

However, there is a second limitation upon the issuance of such currency. This is the amount of capital stock of the national banks. Upon the basis of this limitation the banks could now issue approximately three-quarter billions of dollars in such notes. It is by this limitation that those who have informed the House reach the conclusion that only a billion dollars of additional currency could be issued under the provision of the Glass-Borah amendment.

While it is improbable that there would be such abuses, it is possible to see how the national banks by increase of capital stock and by obtaining the funds for such an increase through the issuance of such currency could greatly expand the currency through this bill. This is not a probable abuse, although possible. What I wish to point out to you in connection with these figures is that with $3,171,000,000 worth of bonds of a higher rate of interest than the 2 per cent consols being made eligible for the issuance of currency how improbable it would be that currency would be left based upon 2 per cent bonds. When a bank could obtain 3 per cent, 3⅛ per cent, and 3⅜ per cent interest upon the bonds against which it based currency, why would it retain 2 per cent bonds for such purposes?

The inevitable result would be immediate depreciation of the 2 per cent consols which now sell at a premium, because they have the currency emission right, thus providing to the United States Government a special benefit in low interest rates as a direct profit from the issuance of national-bank currency.

Under such a plan, it is almost a certainty that these bonds would depreciate to 65 cents on the dollar or less. What effect this would have upon the Government bond market, as well as the other bond markets, one can not immediately say. Only experience could show us the full measure of that effect, but most certainly the destruction of the value of these bonds by taking away from them by indirection one of their values would be a measure of bad faith upon the part of the Government of the United States. In my opinion, the Government would be under obligation to refund as quickly as the law would permit, at 3⅜ per cent, these 2 per cent bonds. This would entail a loss to the taxpayers by additional interest requirement of more than $10,000,000 per year when the operation has been completed.

As to what effect this change of policy upon the currency question would have upon domestic holders of currency and claims upon the Government relative to the gold reserve, one can only speculate. It is not probable that this effect would be seriously shocking. The probability of such an effect upon foreign investors and holders of American claims would be much greater. They might immediately make a run upon the American gold reserve and weaken our monetary position.

Whether or not this measure would actually inflate the currency by another billion dollars is a very speculative question. In the first place, currency is the small-change buying medium of the country. The real medium of exchange of American business are bank deposits and bank credits. The bank deposits alone stand to-day at approximately $50,000,000,000. The bank credits probably can be assumed to add an additional amount to our real medium of exchange. All free gold in America is basically a part of the medium of exchange. All currency now held against various types of deposits and other immobile securities must be added, of course, to this total of medium of exchange. From these figures, it is perfectly clear that the medium of exchange of this Nation has a volume of not less than $60,000,000,000.

Any proposal to materially increase any prices by an inflation of the medium that is not relatively as great in proportion to this amount as the desired increase in commodity prices would, therefore, appear to me to ignore the theory of price relative to volume of exchange. Let us acknowledge, too, that any manipulation of this medium of exchange as long as it is upon the gold basis and as long as there is a free movement of gold between the nations of the world to lift or depress prices must assume the power to elevate or depress the value of the entire free-gold supply of the world as well as exchange media—bank credits, too—remaining upon a gold standard. If this is true, the inflation would be of an amount still scores of billions higher. This is one element in which there can be no national segregation as long as the gold standard survives internationally. Allowance must be made also for those currencies and media remaining on a partial or special gold relationship.

If the advocates of inflation wish to debase by abandoning the gold standard the value of currency or the medium of exchange, they doubtless can attain their end of a manipulation of commodity prices upward without abandoning the gold standard. It seems obvious to me that their project of inflation by expanding either the Federal reserve currency or national-bank currency is a futile gesture.

If debasement is to be resorted to, it means substitution of a speculative dollar for a relatively certain dollar.

The suspended gold standard such as several nations of the world have at this time, the outstanding of which is Great Britain, adds to the gold-base dollar the single element of uncertainty and gambling. No basic producer, no working man, no sound productive business in the history of any nation ever profited in the long run from such a condition. The money manipulators would be the greatest profiters from the manipulations of a period of unstable money.

It seems obvious to me that these economic and historical facts answer completely those who have proposed by various methods of currency inflation to relieve present economic distress. The truth is that we are in a period of downward readjustment of prices. Some injustices have always accompanied such a procedure. Some inequalities have always resulted. The world has not yet found a method of escaping these defects of the system of private property. We are in the moment when the disadvantages of this system are greatest and most glaring.

It was stated earlier that currency is the small change of business. Currency is the medium of exchange which we carry in our pockets and which we hold for that type of payment in our banks. By what line of reasoning are we to assume that the demands for pocket currency are so much greater at the present time, as the currency inflationists indicate? Pocket money takes itself out of circulation, and there is no more demand for it in a time like the present; in fact, not nearly as much as in normal times. The creation of a great amount of small change would be in no sense even a palliative for our present economic distress.

Before I close I wish to point out another possible result from the adoption of the Glass-Borah amendment. If in this lack of demand for pocket currency, instead of replacing national-bank currency this change in policy should result in the displacement of Federal reserve currency to the extent of a billion dollars, the Federal reserve system might conceivably be brought face to face with a very grave situation. This would mean the reduction of Federal reserve currency and Federal reserve credit to the extent of the displacement, which has been assumed to be probably a billion dollars. This would approximate a 60 per cent reduction in Federal reserve credit.

In the face of this suggestion let the Members of the House be reminded or informed, as the case may be, that the Federal reserve bank lost $15,230,000 in its operation in 1931. This loss followed a loss from the surplus of the system amounting to $2,250,000 in 1930. Does the House consider it advisable to adopt this speculative gambling policy with our money when it appears almost certain that any benefits attained as the result of it will be many times overbalanced by the disturbance and destruction of confidence it unquestionably would occasion in the economic world?

The Glass-Borah amendment is probably not a very serious matter but possibly a most expensive one. It positively will cause a loss of several million dollars to taxpayers or holders of the 2 per cent bonds upon which money is issued at this time. Further than this, its effect is speculative and possibly unimportant but probably serious.

The Goldsborough-Steagall amendment is one of the most unsound, most dangerous adventures into the unknown ever suggested to this Government.

If the theory advanced above, that the circulating element sought to be expanded by the inflationists is as much as the minimum figures suggested and the inflationists hope to attain a proportional expansion by Federal reserve bond purchases, it would require it to buy every oustanding bond of the Government of the United States, no matter where it may be located or now held, to bring about a 30 per cent increase in the medium of exchange. To return the commodity prices of the country to the level proposed in the Goldsborough-Steagall amendment would require at least a 30 per cent elevation. Therefore there are not in existence sufficient bonds for the Federal reserve bank to buy in the market for the purpose of issuing currency to bring about the demanded inflation of commodity prices. In other words, the Goldsborough-Steagall amendment proposes an impossible achievement, and does not even lay down the procedure by which it is to be attained. We know, however, that it is meant to be attained by the process of buying United States Government bonds. The whole procedure is futile, but an effort to achieve it would bring about such disturbance in the business world that they probably would destroy our entire economic fabric.

WHAT THE FARM BOARD HAS DONE TO AID AGRICULTURE

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, the inequality between business and agriculture, growing up over a long period of years and accentuated by readjustments at home and abroad following the war, brought about the passage of the agricultural marketing act and the creation of the Federal Farm Board. The avowed purpose of this legislation, enacted by Congress after eight years of agitation and discussion, was to restore to agriculture the equality of economic opportunity with other industries which it had lost largely because of the rugged individualism of the farmer and the aggressiveness of highly organized business interests.

Confronted with as difficult a job as ever given a Government agency, a job which was made doubly hard almost at the outset by the world-wide economic depression, here is what the Farm Board has been doing since the summer of 1929 to help agriculture:

First. Extend loans to organized farmers that have meant more than a billion dollars to the credit structure of the country and have saved cooperatives, with few exceptions, from the financial disaster that has befallen thousands of other business institutions.

Second. Assisted farmers in perfecting and strengthening cooperative associations to the end that producers will have a measure of control in the sale of their products.

Third. Authorized and directed stabilization operations in wheat and cotton that have meant hundreds of millions of dollars in the pockets of farmers and have benefited the country as a whole.

FARM BOARD CREDIT TO COOPERATIVES MOBILIZED TO MEET EMERGENCY

Scarcely had the Farm Board been organized when it became evident that the world-wide economic situation threatened disaster to agricultural prices. The market for farm products was totally undermined by the greatest economic crisis of the generation.

The board recognized the fact that agriculture can not create its own market and that neither organization of farmers nor production readjustments could prevent the drastic decline in farm prices resulting from the falling off in demand. But it also realized that farmers organized in sound cooperative marketing associations occupied a much stronger position in the decline than unorganized producers and that courageous extension of credit to strengthen overdeflated prices and to prevent the failure of sound institutions was the only means of meeting the agricultural emergency.

Its resources were used by the board to develop and keep intact farmer-owned and farmer-controlled marketing organizations in a period marked by ever-increasing failures among business institutions. As a result, no major failure of a farmers' cooperative association has occurred during the past three years. Moreover, disorderly liquidation of farm commodities which would have accelerated bank failures and financial panic in rural areas has been prevented to a large degree.

The operations of the Farm Board have furnished emergency support to agriculture in much the same way as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has recently begun to support other business units. While most lending institutions were sharply reducing credit, the Farm Board notably expanded the volume of credit in use.

By the end of May, 1932, the board had made net loan commitments from the revolving fund of $1,016,006,161.55. Loans outstanding on that date totaled $469,225,738.58. On the average, banks and other private investors have supplied $2 of credit to cooperatives as primary loans for every dollar of credit that the Farm Board has supplied as secondary loans. Loans actually made from the revolving fund up to May 31 had totaled $985,300,000. Interest collections on these loans amounted to $9,100,000.

Approximately 3,700 cooperative marketing associations with more than one and one-quarter million farmer members have benefited from loans amounting to $351,749,392.74, which were made either directly to the association or to the central cooperative marketing agency with which the association is affiliated. Of the money borrowed, the cooperatives had repaid $185,576,904.25, leaving balances outstanding of $166,172,488.49. Direct loan commitments were made by the Farm Board to 152 national, regional, and local cooperatives.

For stabilization purposes the Farm Board had made loans totaling $633,546,034.50, of which $330,492,784.41 had been repaid, leaving balances outstanding of $303,053,250.09. Of the balances outstanding, the Cotton Stabilization Corporation had $98,477,531.33 and the Grain Stabilization Corporation had $204,575,718.76.

Since the Farm Board was created Congress has appropriated $5,527,000 for its use in meeting administrative expenses. Of this sum the board has spent only $3,543,000 and returned to the Federal Treasury $1,977,000. Thus the total administrative cost of the board, it will be noted, has been slightly less than 40 per cent of the $9,100,000 in interest collected by the board on loans made from the revolving fund.

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS

The board's assistance in the development of cooperative marketing has included (1) aid in the organization of cooperatives, (2) improvement in marketing methods and business practices, (3) coordination of marketing through assistance in the federation of local and regional units to form national cooperative agencies, (4) loans from the revolving fund.

About one-third of the farmers in this country are now active members of cooperative organizations. The board has record of about 12,000 cooperative associations, with a total volume of business of $2,400,000,000 in 1930–31—a substantial proportion of the total farm income in the United States. For this season indications are that the business of cooperative organizations will maintain or increase the relationship to farm income which obtained during the previous year.

Business of cooperative associations has increased substantially since the board was organized. Cooperative marketing of all products increased on the average 41 per cent between 1927–28 and 1930–31. In terms of individual commodities, cotton increased 137 per cent, dairy products 28 per cent, poultry products 195 per cent, fruits and vegetables 28 per cent, grain 43 per cent, livestock 20 per cent, wool and mohair 614 per cent, while the cooperative marketing of tobacco declined 35 per cent.

To carry out the policy of the agricultural marketing act, "encouraging the organization of producers into effective associations or corporations under their own control for greater unity of effort in marketing and by promoting the establishment and financing of a farm marketing system of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations and other agencies," the Farm Board adopted a definite policy of aiding in the coordination of cooperative marketing associations on a national scale for the major commodities, and has given what advisory and financial assistance it could in their organization and operation.

The board was convinced that such organizations offered promise of eliminating competition between cooperatives; of attaining the savings realizable from large-scale operations; of developing a method of marketing which would make cooperative facilities available to all producers; of bringing together quantities large enough to secure the maximum advantages from classification by grades and qualities to meet the specialized demands of individual purchasers; of providing at all times an open market with sufficient competition to insure the producer getting all that his product is worth; and of unifying under one control selling efforts by diverse cooperative units, thus increasing producers' bargaining power in the markets, thereby enabling them to obtain better net returns for their commodities.

The board assisted in the establishment of national or regional cooperative organizations to handle practically all of the major agricultural products, including cotton, grain, livestock, wool, and mohair, dairy products, fruits, vegetables, nuts, poultry, and poultry products. Many of these organizations now handle a substantial proportion of the total production of their respective commodities. Some of the organizations, such as the American Cotton Cooperative Association and the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, provide a complete marketing service for their members, which reaches every important market in the United States and abroad.

At the present time more than a million and a quarter farmers are members of cooperatives participating in the various centralized sales agencies. In the past few months there has been marked growth in some of these groups; for instance, the member associations of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, which at the beginning of the present crop year had only about 155,000 members, now have about 208,000, or a growth of upwards of 50,000 farmers. The American Cotton Cooperative Association the past two seasons has handled more than twice as much cotton as its member associations had handled together before the central was set up.

The National Livestock Marketing Association had 297,000 members last summer and now has more than 350,000. It was organized in the summer of 1930 with 14 member cooperative associations and since then 9 State and regional associations have become affiliated. It is building a nation-wide livestock credit structure that has already loaned more than $15,000,000 to livestock producers in 28 States.

Before the organization of the Farmers National Grain Corporation, central sales agency for the grain cooperatives, the most grain handled cooperatively in terminal markets in any one year was 66,000,000 bushels, whereas the Farmers National and its member cooperatives have handled approximately 200,000,000 bushels each of the past two years.

Before the National Wool Marketing Corporation was organized only between 20,000,000 and 30,000,000 pounds of wool and mohair was handled cooperatively. In the past two years the National has averaged about 120,000,000 pounds.

BENEFITS OF STABILIZATION OPERATIONS

The agricultural marketing act authorized the use of stabilization corporations to purchase, store, and handle agricultural commodities for the purpose of controlling surpluses and preventing sudden drastic declines in prices. World supplies of wheat and cotton were already burdensome when the board was created; prices of these products were among the first to give way. Early in the course of the depression Congress, cooperatives, and other groups called upon the board to use its powers to protect farmers from disorganized markets for their products. The board acted accordingly, first by assisting cooperatives to make loans to producers to help them to avoid dumping commodities on already weakened markets and later by recognizing the cotton and wheat stabilization corporations and lending them funds to purchase and hold stocks of the commodities off the markets. Available resources were not great enough to extend such activities to all commodities or to stop completely the decline in wheat and cotton prices. Stabilization did succeed, however, in moderating the decline in prices and in shielding farmers from the full effect of price demoralization until they had had time to begin to adjust their operations to the new conditions.

Not until the commodities are finally sold, of course, can the final cost of the operations be definitely determined. It is clear, however, that stabilization activities protected the position of farmers both directly and indirectly. Directly, they moderated the price decline and deferred the full shock of the depression for from one to two years. This added to farmers' incomes $150,000,000 from wheat, probably better than $200,000,000 from cotton, and about $35,000,000 from wool and mohair, above what they would otherwise have received. In addition to these direct cash benefits to farmers, amounting to $400,000,000 or more, farmers were benefited indirectly by the help received by cooperative marketing associations, local banks, and other financial institutions.

The net indirect benefits to farmers from the support of the agricultural finance and marketing structure of the country are difficult to estimate quantitatively, but undoubtedly equaled or exceeded the direct benefits just enumerated. The gains to farmers from board stabilization activities thus total several times any losses the revolving fund would suffer, even if all the operations were closed out at the excessively low levels prevailing to-day. In addition, the support given wheat and cotton prices by the stabilization operations were of untold benefit to the country as a whole in helping to preserve the business structure of agricultural sections.

ATTACKS FROM ORGANIZED TRADE INDICATE PROGRESS MADE

Expert testimony of the progress being made by the cooperative-marketing movement may be found in the vicious attacks against the organized marketing of farm products under the guise of attacks on the Farm Board. These attacks emanate from the private trades because the development of farmer-owned and farmer-controlled marketing organizations threatens their profits.

In this connection comparison of the earnings of companies listed on the New York Stock Exchange processing and distributing agricultural products with corresponding earnings of companies representing other industrial groups and with the earnings of agricultural producers may be enlightening. For instance, the earnings available for dividends to common stockholders of concerns handling dairy products were 42 per cent greater in 1931 than in 1928; whereas in that period the gross income of agriculture dropped 41 per cent, resulting in farmers suffering a deficit of upward of $1,000,000,000 last year. Comparable earnings of automobile and truck manufacturers decreased 75 per cent, and the steel industry was reduced to a deficit basis. Earnings of baking and flour-milling concerns were off only 2 per cent, and tobacco companies increased their earnings 41 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that farmers were paid record low prices for such tobacco as they were able to sell.

These figures indicate graphically why there is so much opposition to farmer owned and operated marketing associations. It is clearly a case of highly organized business against unorganized agriculture.

In a message to Illinois farmers a few days ago Chairman Stone of the Farm Board sounded a warning against the propaganda attacks being made by handlers of farm products over the radio, in public speeches, and in private conversation against the agricultural marketing act and the work of the Farm Board in helping farmers.

"What have they done in the past to help you better your condition?" Mr. Stone asked farmers of the country.

They have always been and are now against your organizing your own business, so you can control in a measure the sale of your products. What constructive suggestions have they made to better your present condition, except advising you to abandon your efforts to intelligently organize and to place the handling of your business back in their hands?

The agricultural marketing act was passed by Congress to help you. Its principal objective is to help you to organize your business. It is doing that. Do you want it stopped? The law is not perfect. It was not designed to make you rich overnight. It was passed for the purpose of aiding you, through organization, to concentrate your selling power so you can intelligently meet the already concentrated buying power of those who buy your products.

My suggestion to you is to defend your law and do your part toward making it more effective.

REFUNDS OF FEDERAL TAXES

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, there has been much discussion in the House since the close of the national political conventions and since the campaign can be considered as under way upon the subject of refunds of Federal taxes. Much of the discussion has been what seems to me to be of an irresponsible nature at its best interpretation. Charges have been made apparently without investigation. It has always seemed to me a tragedy of American politics that it was found advisable for political opponents to destroy each other in character and reputation in order to acquire public office.

However, the records indicate an effort upon this subject to convince the country that direct theft has been resorted to in connection with administration of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It is intimated, almost said in so many words, that billions of dollars have been refunded to taxpayers in the last few years by this bureau, not as an end to justice but as a method to steal these funds from the Government; and it is intimated that the operations by which these refunds are made are entirely a 1-way procedure and that they do not bring into the Government any money whatsoever.

It was stated by one Member of the House that in the last 10 years, $4,000,000,000 have been refunded to large taxpayers. The source of such information appears concealed. This statement on my part is a defense of no person, and no political party but is intended to bring to the attention of the public facts from the records to be interpreted as the public's wisdom may interpret them.

The tax rebates to all taxpayers for the 10 years ending with 1931 amounted to $1,267,868,645.67. This amount includes all rebates with interest paid to the taxpayers of the Federal Government. The annual payments were:

1922	$48,134,127.83
1923	123,992,820.94
1924	137,006,225.65
1925	151,885,415.60
1926	174,120,177.74
1927	103,858,687.78
1928	142,393,567.17
1929	190,164,359.48
1930	126,836,333.22
1931	69,476,930.26

The tax refunds during this 10-year period, minus interest, amounted to $1,037,056,178.75. For the 7-year period beginning with 1925, the collections through the processes of investigation of tax returns and payments as brought into the Treasury Department amounted to $2,395,223,335. Records for such collections on review of prior years are not available for the years earlier than 1925. For these seven years the refunds amounted to $958,735,467.

From these figures it will be seen that the procedure of reviewing tax returns results in the collection of approximately two and one-half times as much as returned to the taxpayers through all the processes, including court decisions.

The question of refunds on decisions as to depreciation of business establishments has been raised. It is particularly interesting to note that the courts and the Board of Tax Appeals in virtually every big tax case have been more generous with the taxpayers than has the Bureau of Internal Revenue. A list of such cases is given here with the percentage allowed by the bureau and that substituted on appeal:

	Per cent allowed by bureau	Per cent allowed by court or B. T. A.
Hyatt Roller Bearing Co	8	15
Roanoke Mills Co	4	7
J. C. Eves	10	20
Yost & Herrell	10	20
Roshek Realty Co	3	8
Sicilian Asphalt Paving Co	4	10
Port Orange Paper Co	2	6
Gardner Governor Co	2	5
Atlas Plywood Corporation	3	10
Standard Brewery Co. (Inc.)	2½	8
Buffalo Union Furnace Co	5	10
Minnesota Cement Construction Co	2	10
Moberly Oil Co	4	8
Nicholas Contracting Co	15	50
Hughes Coal Co	12½	20
Harvey Coal Corporation	5	10

It is gratifying to know that from 1923 to 1931, with the exception of one year in which changes in compensation of employees were required by law, expenditures for administering the internal revenue laws have shown marked declines from the 1923 operation costs. The cost of collecting each $100 showed a similar decline for those years until 1931, when the cost of collection increased in proportion to decreases in the incomes of the taxpayers. A table showing cost of collecting each $100 and expenditures for administering internal revenue laws from 1923 to 1931 follows:

Fiscal year	Cost of collecting each $100	Expenditures for administering internal revenue laws
1923	$1.39	$36,501,062.94
1924	1.24	34,676,688.11
1925	1.44	[1] 37,266,573.16
1926	1.23	34,948,483.37
1927	1.15	32,967,764.17
1928	1.17	32,599,845.35
1929	1.17	[1] 34,377,082.59
1930	1.13	34,352,063.41
1931	1.40	33,997,785.84

[1] Increases due to changes in compensation of employees required by law.

It has been the experience of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that in its policies the courts have greatly relaxed the rulings relied upon by the bureau in its interpretations of the law.

It is also interesting to note that in every case in which there is a refund of $75,000 or more, the case is reported with the facts to a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, and if the Congress is to be critical of the decisions in these larger cases it seems that this committee of its own membership has been delinquent in not making proper observations when these reports have been made.

It is further interesting to note that the refunds under discussion here are made in large part through contests before the courts of equity and the Board of Tax Appeals, and the awards have been made by these tribunals and drawn upon the Treasury Department without the necessity of the consent of any officer or employee of that department.

NOMINEES AND PLATFORM OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Union League of Philadelphia, on June 21, 1932, on the occasion of the ratification of the candidates nominated and platform adopted at the Republican National Convention:

Mr. President, members of the Union League Club, and guests, I deem it a very great honor to address this historic club—a club that has a record of achievements behind it—a record requiring much to live up to in the future. I deem it a special pleasure—and it is such for me—to come here during the second reign of my good friend "Hampy" Moore. [Applause.]

He and I were "buddies" together on the hill at Washington, and especially so on that great Committee on Ways and Means, whose activities are of such great interest not only to Pennsylvania and Connecticut but to all the other States of the Union. I am glad to return to Philadelphia during this his second administration and join with you in wishing him great success in steering the course of this great city during these troublous times.

I am surprised at the crowd that I find here to-day. I had anticipated a small club luncheon and had intended to simply talk to you as man to man, as Republican to Republican; and even though the audience is many times what I had anticipated, I shall still follow that plan. I am not an orator or an entertainer. I never attempt to indulge in flights of oratory, and, at any rate, I do not regard this as the proper time for such a performance if I were able to carry it out. I did not come with any intention of stirring up an unbounded enthusiasm. It is a little early in the campaign to begin pumping up enthusiasm, because it is a long run between now and November.

Rather, my purpose is that I may stimulate and help you in your thinking. I regard the members of this club as men who do their own thinking; and this is a time for serious thought.

In conversation with your distinguished President at the table it came from him as a suggestion that this is not a gala day. It is rather a serious one in our governmental history. It is not only the longest day of the year but I am afraid it will be one of the saddest, because on this 21st day of June one of the most burdensome tax bills ever passed by an American Congress becomes effective. This additional load comes down upon your shoulders to-day, and its burden will surely be felt.

Reference to the increased tax burden is in line with some of the reasons that I shall attempt to give you why we should wholeheartedly and enthusiastically join in the ratification of the ticket nominated and the platform adopted at Chicago last week. I shall divide these reasons into two major classes: The first reason why we should ratify this ticket and support it upon the platform adopted is a positive one. First and foremost, the man whom we have nominated—yes, renominated—to head our ticket, is a man whose record of achievement alone clearly entitles him not only to this renomination but to the support of his party and of the entire country. [Applause.]

The first portion of Herbert Hoover's record, which was generally known to the public, was but the preliminary stage of preparation for the much greater task upon which he is now engaged. When he first emerged into the public eye it was as an executive handling great problems in a time of great world stress. He was feeding the millions of those who were suffering in foreign lands during the period of the Great War. His service in this connection, the acquaintances he formed, the experiences he had, the statesmen he met and dealt with, the world conditions with which he became familiar—all gave to Herbert Hoover first-hand knowledge of many of the things necessary to be handled when he assumed the great office of President. His acquaintance with world figures, his knowledge of world affairs, were unique in human history. Then he came home after the war was over and took up one of the comparatively minor departments of our Government and, as you know, made it great. His work in that department was of such a character as to bring universal recognition of its excellence.

Then he was made President of the United States. All seemed fair sailing at that time. We were out upon the open seas, the sun was shining, and everything was lovely. But he had not been in that great office long before the clouds began to gather over every land and sea. Then it began to sprinkle, and soon to pour. The fiercest of storms broke and is still raging. Almost from the time he entered upon the duties of this office we have been going through a period of stress and strain such as this country never before experienced, not even in the days of the Civil War or the great World War; because on those occasions there was always present an additional impulse of patriotism, under the influence of which men and women will do willingly what you can not expect them to do in a time when these emotions are not present.

And thus through the most troublesome period of all our history this man has been guiding the ship of state. It would now seem that no new unfavorable thing could happen to us. It is like the dramatic picture so vividly presented in the prologue of the Book of Job, where one messenger after another arrives bringing evil tidings. So has it been for nearly three years, in which one calamity has followed hard upon another, coming from all directions; and yet our President, ever at his task, has never faltered. He has always been ready to present something instanter that will either stay or mitigate the threatened danger or possibly avert it altogether.

True, not everything that has been tried has been completely successful. All of the problems tackled have not been immediately solved, and as we look back upon them we realize that many of these problems were in fact insoluble.

Critics our President has had all the way along, hostile critics, malevolently hostile critics, ready to minimize every success and to magnify every failure. We all know that when men are feeling uncomfortable, when something has happened that has caused them to feel poor, it is only old human nature that they are inclined to place the blame upon the head of some one else, and the head that happens to stick up the highest above the crowd is the one most apt to be selected as the target for the blame. So it has been with the President and those engaged in faultfinding and captious criticism, most of which can be in no wise justified by facts or reason.

Meanwhile our President has toiled on, sticking manfully to his task. If he had gained experience before he came into office that has been useful to him and the Nation, what must we say of the experience he has gained since he has been there? [Applause.]

What a misfortune to this country it would be to lose now the benefit of such experience as he has had. The other day a Democratic friend given to wise cracks came up to me and said: "We think we now have a slogan that will knock out that time-honored argument of Abraham Lincoln, which you Republicans are always using, that we should not swap horses while crossing a stream." I said, "What is it? Spring it." "Well," he said, "it is that you should not attempt to change barrels while going over Niagara Falls." He advanced this as a complete answer, but I told him that it only confirmed and emphasized the forceful argument of Lincoln, because what he describes as going over Niagara is something like the condition in which we now find ourselves. We are going over the falls, but I reminded my friend that we are in a barrel that has thus far proved to be a good one—the best that could possibly be obtained. I added that I thought it would be a somewhat risky performance to try to change barrels, and especially so if we happened to change over into a leaky one while we were in the operation of going over Niagara Falls. I ventured to suggest that we should not only not attempt to change before reaching the bottom of the falls, but that it would be wiser to wait until we had passed out through the rapids and down into the placid waters of Lake Ontario. [Applause.]

So much for our candidate.

Now for the second reason. The second positive reason that we should ratify and confirm at election time this ticket is because of the platform upon which our party has elected to stand. I have heard that at first there was some little dissatisfaction among those who held extreme views as to one plank of the platform. This was made evident yesterday in the Senate of the United States, when one of their distinguished orators addressed himself to the particular plank of the platform to which I have referred and to which I shall further refer in only a word. Speaking as a man from Connecticut, it is not out of place for me to remind you that Connecticut was one of the two States that had the good sense never to ratify the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

Speaking from the Connecticut viewpoint of course, I should say that if I had been writing from our point of view I should have probably worded the platform somewhat differently. However, when I came home and finished reading it all I became convinced that those who hold the same views that Connecticut has held on the subject had made in this platform very, very great progress in the right direction. Therefore, I say without the slightest hesitation that the platform, in this regard as in others, is something that all good Republicans can afford to stand upon.

I now wish to call your attention to the trend and purport of the platform and not to the details, because that would take entirely too long. In fact, it requires more than an hour to read it. I wish we might raise up a crop of platform makers who would produce short, snappy planks to go into our party platforms. However, we must take platforms and platform makers as we find them, and I venture to say that when you have the time to read this platform and carefully study it you will find it a platform that should satisfy every proper demand that real Republicans could make upon it.

In the first place, the platform is a conservative one, and I mean that in no reactionary sense. I mean one of those platforms which is safe to stand upon, not a shaky one. In this platform for the first time we have emphasized the side of safety. In platforms generally we find all sorts of promises to spend money for this, spend money for that, we propose to be liberal toward this enterprise and toward that, toward waterways, reclamation, flood control, public buildings—all the different activities of the Government in which a respectable minority of the people may chance to be interested.

While times were good and money was easy taxes came light. Taxpayers paid little attention to the mounting expenditures; but they have gone on mounting, until to-day, this 21st of June, 1932, we are confronted with a tax law under which must be collected considerably more than a billion dollars additional annually from the taxpayers of the United States. This added burden will surely be felt under existing conditions. Our platform gives hope and courage to those men who are determined, like your mayor, to balance the Budget of the Government and to keep it balanced.

The platform comes out soundly for protection, for which we have always stood. The platform goes straight to the point in regard to the gold standard. There is no uncertainty about it; it negatives all such ideas as the tremendous bond issues that have been proposed as it does the issuance of billions of dollars of flat money. All of these dangerous proposals are negatived by our platform, making it clear that we are going to stand firmly for sound money, as the Republican Party has always done. [Applause.]

Then there is another feature of the platform, if you will study it. In every department of government, so far as it is possible, if our platform is any guide, expenditures must be reduced to the lowest point practicable without seriously crippling necessary services of the Government. Retrenchment under the platform goes to the extent of suggesting that even in the relief of veterans the expense might to a certain extent be lessened, and lessened without touching in any way any man or the dependents of any man who actually suffered by reason of his participation in the military service of the United States in time of war.

There is a third reason, and I think it the strongest of all. It is the negative side of the case. If not the Republican Party with Hoover, then what?

The necessary alternative presented is to-day the strongest point in the minds of the thoughtful people of this country. If not the Republican Party, of course the Democratic Party—then what may we expect? We may judge the future only by the experiences of the past. There is little in the record of that great party to give encouragement. We all know of the large graveyard of Democratic fallacies that are dead and buried. They are often referred to, but we need not revert to them now. We have to-day an example of what we may expect with Democracy supreme in this Government, and we need only go back over the last six months to review the unhappy history of Capitol Hill in Washington.

The things that have been done there, and even more the things that have been proposed there, are not at all encouraging to the country. As you know, for the most part the good things that have been done have been done as nearly as possible in line with the program made by the President himself. In addition to the program that the President proposed, and which to some extent our Democratic brethren have joined us in carrying out, they have insisted upon doing a number of other things that ought not to have been done. They have been proposing a number of things even worse than anything thus far actually accomplished, and in the few minutes remaining to me I shall call your attention to some of these.

The most important by far of all the problems confronting the present Congress was that of balancing the Budget. All other aims and purposes should have been secondary. The national credit, the restoration of confidence, and the return of normal conditions all depended upon it. It should have been the one thing uppermost. Thoughtful men everywhere know that it must be done if we would protect—yes, save—the national credit. It was the prime object of the session and many Democrats have joined in the effort to effect it, but not all. In fact, since joining in the effort to pass the tax bill, most of our Democratic friends in the House of Representatives have so far fallen from grace that they have joined in passing through the House a proposition that would not only unbalance the Budget for the present, but would mortgage our future by making it well nigh impossible to balance our Budget for years to come. I need only refer you to the so-called Garner bill, of "pork-barrel" fame, and remind you that if this bill as it passed the House should become a law it would undo all that has been done in the way of balancing the Budget. Then, I need not remind you of the proposition to issue to even such worthy persons as our veterans the sum of nearly two and a half billions of dollars of fiat money. I have only to call your attention to the fact that this proposition was instigated by Democrats; was forced for consideration upon the floor of the House by Democrats; and was passed through the House largely by Democratic votes. If this bill should become a law in the form in which it actually passed the House two billions four hundred millions of fiat money would be issued at once without gold or other security back of it, which would probably take us off the gold standard with all the attendant dislocation of our fiscal system, and I do not know, perhaps no one knows, what other ills would flow from such a startling proposition were it carried into effect.

There are other proposals almost as startling—the Goldsborough bill, for instance, and the proposal guaranteeing bank deposits. Earlier in the session a hundred thirty-two millions was voted through for roads—a hundred thirty-two millions out of the Federal Treasury for roads when the Treasury is empty. Other bills have been proposed by Democrats but not acted upon. They indicate, however, what the country may expect, if in a careless or reckless moment the people of the United States should turn and place the control of this Government in the hands of the Democratic Party.

It is something for serious-minded men to think seriously upon, as to what they might expect. The same men in charge of the House of Representatives to-day will be the men in charge of that House should it continue Democratic in the next Congress, and they will be the principal advisers to the Democratic President, should there be a Democratic President. What may we expect? I say it is time for serious-minded men to be thoughtful and try to visualize what is going to happen should Democrats triumph. We can not judge of the future in any other way than from the facts already before us, and the bills to which I have referred are the proposals that have been made in the present session of Congress by those men who will control Congress and the next administration, should Democracy win in the next election.

I do not believe the people will readily accept such an alternative. There are, of course, some thoughtless, reckless ones who will say, "Things can not be worse; we should have a change." I tell you things can be very much worse. They are worse in other countries than here, and they can be very much worse here. If we may judge by what has already occurred in the present Congress, it would be the first step toward making things very much worse to now place the control of this Government in the hands of a party with the record the Democratic Party has already made in the present Congress.

I hesitate to use a sacred story to illustrate even a serious point, but I do it with all reverence, I assure you. I refer to that little episode that happened on the slopes of the hills surrounding the Sea of Galilee 1,900 years ago. You will recall that the Master had been feeding the multitudes with loaves and fishes and many people were following Him. Finally, when the proper occasion came to give them some good and wholesome advice, He began to teach them some of the wonderful truths of His gospel.

Men do not always like to hear the truth, especially if it happens to hit them on an unpleasantly sore spot personally, which must have been the case in this instance, because it is recorded in Holy Writ that from that time many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him. When the loaves and fishes were exhausted and the worth-while things of eternal life were being revealed to them, their enthusiasm began to wane. After the multitude had departed and only the twelve were left, the Master turned to them and said, "Will ye also go away?" Simon Peter, that impulsive disciple, sized up the situation at once and answered the question completely, in what we should now call true yankee fashion, by asking Him a question, "Master, to whom shall we go?"

I believe that the people of America will ask themselves the same question when they come to decide between what they now have and may continue to have with Herbert Hoover and the Republican Party on the one hand and what they may expect from any other alternative. When they look on the other side of the picture, and see what they may expect, if they do "go away," we may confidently expect a wholehearted turning in our direction. We have every reason, as Republicans, as Americans, as patriots, here in this historic city of Philadelphia, to ratify this ticket on this platform and to go forward in all our might and with all the means at our command to confirm and establish the ticket and the platform at the November election. If we do this we may look forward to another four years at least with a feeling of safety that all that can be done of all that human minds can conceive and human hands execute, will be done, as it has been done during the last three years, during which time the most hostile critics, with all the tremendous advantage of hindsight over foresight, have not been able to point out where the President, throughout this greatest of emergencies has done any of those things that he ought not to have done, or has left undone any of those things that he should have done. [Applause.]

We can go forward, and I believe that we shall go forward, with the assurance that however unfavorable may be the present economic situation, we confidently believe in greater and better things for our country, and that the best way to bring these greater and better things to pass is to hold on to the good, the trusted and tried, and to embark upon no dangerous experiments in this critical time of stress and strain. [Prolonged applause.]

CAPE COD CANAL

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, there is pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a bill providing for the dredging and widening of the Cape Cod Canal. The Cape Cod Canal and its maintenance in the best condition possible is of extreme importance to shipments by water along the Atlantic coast, and of equal importance to our national defense. The committee has conducted hearings on this bill, and favorable action has been taken thereon. It is quite probable that the authorization essential to appropriate the money necessary to the carrying out of this work will be contained in the next rivers and harbor bill. The necessity of having the canal improved as contemplated in the pending bill as soon as possible is clearly evidenced by the collisions and groundings which have occurred since 1925, which are as follows:

1925

Fishing schooner Aeolus, collided with Sagamore Bridge.

Motor boat K–14883 struck on bank of canal or a semifloating obstruction.

1926

Fishing schooner Dorcas was slightly damaged by collision with another vessel inside the easterly entrance, an accident which probably could have been avoided.

1927

Steamer Eastern Tempest, while passing through the canal in tow of tugs, struck the bank several times and sustained considerable damage. The Eastern Tempest was a large vessel without cargo and was not using her own power. This accident may be attributed to restricted width of channel and strong current.

Steamer Boston, carrying passengers and general cargo, was slightly damaged by striking on bank. Accident caused by restricted width of channel and strong current.

Fishing vessel Orion was somewhat damaged by collision with a dredge scow.

Motor barge Colonial Beacon, loaded with petroleum products, grounded on canal bank, due to narrow channel and strong current.

Steamer Boston, carrying passengers and general cargo, grounded on the canal bank account fog.

1928

Motor barge Providence Socony, loaded with petroleum products, was considerably damaged by striking canal banks. Cause, restricted width and strong current.

Tug Elmer A. Keeler was considerably damaged by striking canal banks. Cause, restricted width and strong current.

Barges Tipton and Marion, loaded with coal, while moored at dolphins, were damaged by wash and suction from passing vessel. Cause, restricted width of channel.

Steamer New York, carrying passengers and general cargo, grounded and swung across canal account narrow channel, strong current, and high winds.

Barges Orleans and Chatham, without cargo, collided with bridge and ferry structures and were considerably damaged. This accident is attributed to narrow channel and strong tidal current.

Sloop yacht Taurus and fishing vessel Joppiate, collision.

Fishing schooner Wesley W. Sinnett ran ashore on canal bank. It is believed that this accident should have been avoided.

Motor ship Pinthis, while attempting to tie up at mooring dolphins, grounded and was somewhat damaged. Attributable to strong current.

1929

U. S. S. Paulding grounded, breaking propeller and doing other damage. Cause, restricted width of channel.

Steamer F. H. Dimock ran ashore on canal bank account fog. Believed undamaged.

Fishing vessel Pathfinder collided with the railroad bridge. Sustained considerable damage, and one man was drowned. The accident was caused by strong current.

1930

Barges Reliance and Chapman, without cargo, collided with bridge fender.

Steamer Robert E. Lee stuck on canal bank. Cause, narrow channel and strong current.

Barge Gotham 84 collided with fenders on both highway bridges.

Fishing vessel Alice and Mildred ran ashore account fog.

U. S. S. James K. Paulding struck canal bank. Cause, narrow channel and swift current.

Motor-barge T. J. Conway struck on canal bank account derangement of steering gear. Two weeks later the barge T. J.

Conway ran ashore on the canal bank; also lost anchor. Cause, steering-gear trouble.

Steamer New York, carrying passengers and freight, ran ashore account narrow channel and strong current.

Motor-barge No Nox, loaded with gasoline, struck on canal bank and sustained considerable damage. Cause, narrow channel and swift current.

Motor-barge Irene W. Allen, loaded with gasoline, ran ashore and was seriously damaged. Cause, narrow channel and swift current.

1931

Steamer Hartwelson, without cargo, struck canal banks and sustained damage. Cause, narrow channel and swift current.

Motor-barge Justine C. Allen, loaded with 1,500 tons of gasoline, struck canal bank and was considerably damaged. Cause, narrow channel and swift current.

Fishing vessel Colonel Lindbergh ran ashore at west end of the canal account mistaking lights.

Steamer Ontario, carrying general cargo, Boston to Philadelphia, grounded on south side of canal channel account heavy winds and snowstorm. Little, if any, damage.

Motor-barge No Nox with a cargo of gasoline ran ashore and was considerably damaged account narrow channel and swift current.

Steamer Juniata, with passengers and general cargo, Baltimore to Boston, ran ashore account narrow channel and swift current. The steamer was only slightly damaged.

Fishing vessel, Elizabeth and James, ran ashore and filled with water. Cargo of fish was removed. The vessel subsequently floated with little damage. Cause of accident, unknown.

United States submarine R–10 ran ashore account steering gear trouble. It is believed that no damage resulted.

Tug Margaret Howard, towing barge Eagle Hill, loaded with stone, ran ashore account steering gear derangement. Both tug and barge were somewhat damaged.

Barge Druid Hill, coal laden, in tow of tug T. J. Hooper, ran ashore on canal bank, and after being floated, was beached to prevent sinking in deep water. The accident was caused by narrow channel and swift current.

U. S. S. Herndon ran ashore account high wind and narrow channel. The Herndon was apparently uninjured.

Motor barge Supreme, with a cargo of petroleum, ran ashore and was considerably damaged. Cause, restricted width of channel and strong tidal currents.

Motor barge New England, with a cargo of 18,000 gallons of petroleum, ran ashore and was obliged to jettison cargo. The vessel was considerably damaged. Accident is attributable to fog.

Fishing vessel Mildred Agnes sunk by collision with barge Tipton. Accident was caused by narrow channel and swift current.

The above information was transmitted to me by the Maritime Association of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, based upon a letter received by Frank S. Davis, manager of the Maritime Association, from the War Department, dated July 1, 1932.

In addition to the above official information as to accidents and groundings recorded since 1925, I have been reliably informed by the Maritime Association that there have been a number of minor accidents and groundings which have not been recorded, including the touching of bottom by vessels by the Eastern Steamship Line (Inc.), the vessels involved continuing on their way, but which has resulted in the Eastern Steamship Line (Inc.) spending a substantial sum of money each year to repair the damages caused by the groundings.

IMPORTANT PROPOSALS

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, to my mind everything I or anyone else has ever done or tried to do for the farmer in Congress sinks into insignificance and naught when compared with my desire to solve the farm problem and my hope that the contract plan evolved by me is a proper solution of this great question. So in the very beginning of this statement let me explain again the details of this plan.

My plan is to offer the farmers the very best possible governmental assistance, provided the farmers themselves will effectively organize and by voluntary contract control production and marketing, thus eliminating the overproduction evil. I would offer them help so wonderful as to cause them to easily see that they would not at all be entitled to the relief without effective organization on their part, thus causing them to organize gladly. I would help them organize so as to become recipients of the great benefits offered them and thus bring about mutual arrangements under which the Government would be doing only that which the farmer can not now do for himself and the farmer be doing all that he can do without governmental aid, a program which when fully installed will make the farmers of the Nation independent and able to manage their own affairs without further or future aid from their Government. In its last analysis my plan seeks to effect a voluntary organization of the farmers so thorough and efficient as to make the farmers masters of their own fortune and not in any sense longer dependent upon governmental assistance. Now, for the details or mechanics of my plan.

The bill is patterned after the War Finance Corporation act, the first sections being identical with that act, except that the bill proposes to create the farmers' finance corporation rather than the War Finance Corporation. This corporation is to be authorized to make loans through the banks of the Nation, much the same as the War Finance Corporation, directly to the producers of basic agricultural commodities. The loans are to bear 4 per cent interest or less, be made for the full amount of the average price of the commodity for the last 10 years, with the commodity as the sole and only collateral, with maturity postponed until the sale of the commodity, and without any right on the part of the farmers' corporation to collect any part of the loan not repaid by the sale of the commodity. Thus the farmer will in effect be receiving as a part of the sale price of his commodity an amount equal to the average price for which he usually sells the commodity, thereby establishing the average price of the commodity as the minimum price of the same.

It takes two to make a contract, and no one could expect a Government-owned corporation to be required by Congress to render so great a benefit to the farmers without their agreeing to do something on their part to make the corporation secure in the loans made. There should be and must be a mutuality of contract, with a good and sufficient consideration flowing, and to flow between the farmers, the bank through which they are to get their loans, and the farmers' finance corporation.

Therefore, the bill provides that before any of the loans mentioned are made farmers planting 75 per cent of the acreage of cotton, for instance, grown in the United States shall have signed and abided by contracts with each other, with their banks, and with the corporation, agreeing and obligating themselves that the cotton advisory council be authorized to control, within reasonable limits, the acreage planted, so as to hold production within reasonable bounds, and that the farmer will not sell any of the particular basic commodity without express authority from the advisory council. Briefly stated, by my plan Congress would simply propose to the farmers that if they would by mutual contracts control their production and marketing, then the farmers' finance corporation would by loans enable the farmers to name within reason the selling price of the products of their own toil.

The farmer would be required to hold his product off the market until it could be sold for enough to repay the loan, all charges, such as storage, insurance, interest, and so forth, and such an additional amount to the farmers as would remain from the sale of the commodity at a fair price. The farmer would be able to hold his products, for he could borrow at a very low rate of interest the reasonable value of his product.

The farmer would contract to curtail his production, provided his friends would contract to curtail their production, on condition that all farmers make a similar reduction, and provided he received more for the lesser amount produced than he would if he produced without limit. My bill provides simply that the Government make an offer to the farmers to help them solve their great farm problem, provided the farmers contract to control the great overproduction and surplus menace.

All other farm relief bills are either silent as to the all-important factor of production control or seek through penalties or other equally vicious methods to control production. This plan seeks to control production and marketing by the voluntary act of the farmers entered into as a part and parcel of the farm-relief scheme itself. All other bills dodge to a great extent this vital feature of the surplus-production control. My bill recognizes this as the heart of the farm-relief plan, and deals with it in a way that must be effective if operation is secured under the scheme. There can be no effective farm relief without effective production and marketing control.

Just as surely as we elevate prices without some sort of control of production, just so surely will the farmers themselves plant more corn and more cotton and more wheat and produce more, and bring about the greater production. In other words, any bill which fails to have within it a proper control of production has failure written on its pages.

It will be observed that my bill provides a most excellent referendum and recall. Unless 75 per cent of the acreage of the commodity is under contracts signed by the farmers themselves, the law will not become operative as to the particular commodity. Then, again, the contracts are made for only one year, and if the plan proves unsatisfactory to the farmers they can refuse to renew and thus cause the plan to become inoperative as to the particular commodity.

After the bill is passed the cotton producers may cause it to become operative as to cotton and the producers of other commodities may refuse, and vice versa.

My bill is not contrary to any other farm-relief plan, such as the McNary-Haugen plan or the debenture plan, and may be passed along with any other bill or bills and leave the farmers to determine whether they will operate under my plan or under some other.

I have endeavored to make definite the duties of the officials in charge of the farmers' finance corporation so as to eliminate red tape and uncertainties.

I have provided a plan for the selection of the members of the various commodity councils which I believe is constitutional, and which authorizes the governors of the commodity-producing States to make the appointments of the members of the council.

In conclusion let me say that in my humble judgment my bill would put the control of the farmer's great problem in the hands of his friends, not his enemies; would help the farmer directly and not indirectly; would provide a complete solution of the overproduction problem; would enable the farmer, within reasonable bounds, to name the price of his own commodity; and for the first time would put him on a parity with other enterprises and industries.

Now let me say I am very much disappointed that so little has been done for the common people at this session of Congress. As usual, the wealthier class has received the most attention. All the great battles for the common people have been in vain. Take for instance the various bills to pay the veterans of the World War the balance due them as adjusted compensation. I voted and did all I could for this payment because I believed it is an honest debt due men who need their money, and because I firmly believe this additional money put into circulation at this time would do much to relieve the present awful suffering of our people.

Approximately the amount that would be paid in cash to veterans in my district, by counties, is as follows:

Appling	$161,099.40
Atkinson	83,417.40
Bacon	85,365.50
Berrien	177,216.60
Brantley	83,426.50
Brooks	258,093.00
Camden	76,689.80
Charlton	53,010.10
Clinch	84,881.50
Coffee	238,841.90
Cook	136,863.10
Echols	32,202.40
Glynn	234,740.00
Irwin	147,607.90
Jeff Davis	98,227.80
Lanier	62,799.00
Lowndes	362,927.40
Pierce	151,516.20
Telfair	181,463.70
Ware	321,351.80
Wayne	153,028.70
Total	3,184,769.70

I list both Brooks and Telfair Counties. I do this since I now represent Brooks, but my district under the new apportionment will lose Brooks and gain Telfair.

The veterans are entitled to this money; but even if the veterans were left clear out of the picture, this amount of money turned loose in these counties would be of untold value to all the people.

In a previous discussion I showed how this money could be raised without taxing it out of our people. Over my bitter protest by bond issues we are raising more than this amount for donations, in effect, to the great corporations. Why not use this money to pay a just debt to these veterans?

A mighty drive has been made to inflate the currency. I favor this, provided a reasonable portion of the currency gets into the hands of the common average citizen.

The trouble with practically all the inflation proposals, is that the big banks are to get practically all the benefit of the inflation. This would not be the case if the money raised in connection with the inflation was paid to the veterans of the World War.

Another most important subject on which I have taken a decided stand is the railroad question. Many say put busses and trucks under the Interstate Commerce Commission and leave them there, and all will be well. I have heretofore urged that this without more would be one of the most dangerous things ever done. There is most serious danger of the railroads going into the bus business and purposely wrecking the small lines of the country. I understand that even now the Pennsylvania Railroad owns the Greyhound Bus Line, which is destroying and wrecking the railroads of my State. Just think what is happening. Millions and billions of dollars are being squeezed out of the poor to be loaned to big railroads like this, to be used in squeezing the life out of such roads as the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic, the Georgia, Southern & Florida, the Southern, the Atlantic Coast Line, the Seaboard, and so on. Congress, instead of trying to stop this kind of thing, is aiding and abetting the outrage in every way possible. Unless something is done soon many of the small towns of the country up to a population of ten and fifteen thousand people will find themselves without a railroad; most of our counties will have no railroads; our public schools and other State institutions will be closed the entire year for lack of funds, and there will be left no such thing as a free, independent American citizen.

Our railroads, except a few long-distance through lines, will be a thing of the past. The roads the people built will be in complete control of great transportation monopolies, charging just such fares as they wish. There will be no competition. The people will be paying taxes to keep the roads up, and the great bus lines will be paying practically nothing in the way of taxes. The independent bus line will have long since been choked to death, and under the law no new ones can begin. This is not a new idea of mine. I have repeatedly on the floor of the House urged that legislation be passed to keep this awful condition from coming to pass.

On March 21, 1930, when a bill was pending to put the busses under the Interstate Commerce Commission, I made these very contentions on the floor of the House and offered several amendments to that bill, all of which were defeated. The friends of the big transportation lines would not let a single amendment get by that would at all prevent the awful thing I have just pictured. See pages 5884, 5885, Seventy-first Congress, second session, March 21, 1930.

One of my amendments which was voted down would have prevented the capitalization for rate-making purposes of either "good will, value as going concern, easement, right, or privilege of using any highway, street, or other public thoroughfare." Another of my amendments which was voted down and which is self-explanatory is as follows:

(g) There shall at all times remain in either the respective States or the United States of America, or both, for the use of the public the fee simple title, full ownership, and every easement, right, and privilege of using any and all public roads, streets, highways, and other thoroughfares over which any bus line may be permitted to operate in any way or by any device; and in any proceeding to determine the justness or reasonableness of any rate, fare, or charge of any such carrier there shall be taken into consideration and fullest weight shall be given in behalf of the public (a) to said title, ownership, and rights; (b) to public expenditure for maintenance, repair, and original cost; (c) to the probable damage to said public thoroughfare by the operation of said bus lines; and (d) to the incident traffic congestion and burden occasioned thereby.

Another amendment which I sponsored and which went down before an avalanche of noes is as follows:

(h) No bus line or lines, or part thereof, when owned by any railroad, electric, or water transportation line, either as result of consolidation, purchase, original certificate, a charter right, or otherwise, shall be permitted or required to produce an income on any property except that used specifically for the operation of said bus line or for proper housing and convenience of the public in connection with said transportation, and no such bus line shall in any way be burdened with making or producing an income on any value or assets of any railroad, electric line, water-transportation line, air-transportation line, or other transportation line with which, by which, or as a part of which it may be operated; neither shall any bus line become a part and parcel of any other public-utility corporation so as to be permitted or required to produce an income on any property not owned as aforesaid and subject to the limitations herein set forth.

Thus it will be seen the great danger that awaits us if we put the busses under the Interstate Commerce Commission without some legislation for protection of the public. If there is no danger of a tremendous transportation monopoly doing the very things I anticipate and so much fear, why should there be any objection to my amendments to prevent these things? The answer is self-evident.

Mr. Speaker, during the present depression there are two conflicting lines of legislative thought. The advocates of one say let us make some great worth-while improvements while the cost is low and there is so much need for more employment. Others say let us leave off everything possible for the present.

As usual, there is much of merit in each. A sane, reasonable program is best. Among the worth-while big things to be accomplished I had hoped to secure the construction of a canal across south Georgia and north Florida in the immediate future. But even if actual construction is to be temporarily postponed, it is essential that in the meantime ample surveys be made and the proper route selected.

Under authorizations contained in the last river and harbor act preliminary surveys of the entire field have been made. The engineers have done careful work and, I am advised, have studied every route that has been suggested and in which there appears any real merit. Most careful consideration has been given by the engineers to every route suggested by me.

Two actual physical surveys of this canal route have now been authorized—one for a ship canal along the most practical route for that purpose, with a barge survey along same route, and also a barge route entirely independent, separate, and apart from the ship-canal route.

SHIP-CANAL ROUTE

It has been determined that this survey for a ship canal will be either along the St. Marys-St. Marks route or south thereof.

BARGE-CANAL ROUTE

I am thoroughly convinced that the barge-canal route will be either along the St. Marys-St. Marks route or north thereof.

ST. MARYS HAS TWO CHANCES

Thus it will be seen St. Marys has two chances at the canal. Either the ship-canal route or the barge-canal route may be located along the St. Marys-St. Marks route or St. Marys River may be the eastern terminus with the canal proceeding north of St. Marks on its way to the Gulf.

THREE BARGE ROUTES

To my mind the detail survey for barge purposes will be along either the St. Marys-St. Marks route or the Altamaha-Ocmulgee-Flint Rivers route or what I am pleased to call the Willacoochee route. The first two routes just mentioned have been discussed so fully until I will not deal further with them now. The Willacoochee route being more or less a new proposal, I shall discuss it rather fully.

WILLACOOCHEE ROUTE

Since the city of Willacoochee, Ga., on this route is located on top of the divide between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean, I have termed it the Willacoochee route. This route has certain features of considerable merit not possessed by the others.

This route uses Brunswick Harbor as the Atlantic terminus, following Turtle River as far westward as practicable; thence along a proposed canal—new excavation; thence westward to Satilla River, a little east of the confluence of Satilla and Little Satilla Rivers; thence westward along the Satilla River to where Pudding Creek flows into the Satilla River in Atkinson County, Ga.; thence westward along Pudding Creek to the headwaters thereof near Willacoochee; thence by way of the proposed new canal construction for 3 or 4 miles through sand-bed divide between Atlantic and Gulf on and near eastern bank of Alapaha River to the Alapaha River on Gulf side of the divide; thence northeastward along Alapaha River to most practical point; thence along proposed new construction along most practical route to Flint River; thence by way of Flint and Apalachicola Rivers to Gulf of Mexico at St. Georges Sound.

The Willacoochee route is along easily controlled streams with abundant water supply for a greater distance than any route yet suggested. It seems to me there are greater water-power possibilities on this route than on any other.

Dams just below the confluence of (a) the Little Satilla and Satilla Rivers, (b) Satilla River and Pudding Creek, and (c) Alapaha River and Willacoochee Creek, would probably develop considerable power, would furnish ample water for entire canal, and, with little cost, make practically the entire canal navigable from the Atlantic to many miles beyond the divide on the gulf side. A few other dams might be necessary.

The proposed dam below the confluence of Willacoochee Creek and Alapaha River would provide an ample reservoir of water for the canal located at the highest point on the route. Then again, as a matter of power development, flood control, and navigation, it occurs to me that a dam could be constructed on the Ocmulgee River near the headwaters of Willacoochee Creek which, with a small canal, would divert any additional amount of water that may be desired from the Ocmulgee River, to be brought along Willacoochee Creek to proposed reservoir at crest or peak of canal near Willacoochee, Ga. It will be observed that the Ocmulgee River flows practically due south all the way from near Atlanta, Ga., to near the headwaters of Willacoochee Creek, but then is deflected by a narrow escarpment of highland (the divide between the Gulf and Atlantic), turns, and swings northeastward. If the Ocmulgee had flowed only a few miles farther on its due south course, it would have joined the channel of the Willacoochee Creek, flowed through to the Alapaha River, and would have entered the Gulf of Mexico instead of the Atlantic Ocean. However, if the waters of the Ocmulgee had gone a little farther eastward and broken through the escarpment into the headwaters of the Satilla, it would have flowed through the channel of that river and enterd the Atlantic Ocean.

The channel of Willacoochee Creek and of the Satilla River are only a few miles apart and parallel to each other, practically all the way from the Ocmulgee to the proposed Willacoochee canal route. The divide between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean is between these two streams. This fact, together with the fact that so much of the Alapaha and Satilla Rivers and Pudding Creek extends practically east and west in the proper direction for the proposed canal, led me to request a preliminary survey of this route.

The portion of the proposed canal from the Alapaha River to the Flint River is to be located wherever it is most practicable from an engineering standpoint. I am not as familiar with this territory as I am with the portion of the route farther east, but am quite sure that a stream flowing into the Alapaha very probably can be easily connected with a stream flowing into the Flint and thus make necessary the excavation of only a very few miles between. At any rate, the new construction on the proposed Willacoochee route will probably be much less than along any other route yet suggested.

There can be impounded at or near Willacoochee ample water to make the Alapaha navigable as far as it is followed to the west and then, I am sure, there will be an abundant quantity of water to supply the newly constructed canal all the way to the Flint River.

Then again a large amount of water can be impounded where the canal reaches the Flint River. Still an additional supply of water can be impounded along the new cut where many small rivers or creeks are intersected. If the Alapaha is followed northwest to the southwest corner of Irwin County, and thence along a small creek, shown on the map, to a point near where the Southern Railroad crosses the line between Tift and Turner Counties, just north of the station at Chula, it will be necessary to excavate only 10 or 15 miles, crossing several small streams, before a stream will be reached flowing into the Flint River.

If the course just mentioned should be followed, there would be only 25 or 30 miles, or probably less, of new excavation away from streams on the entire route between the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. Of course, a study of the field might develop the best portion of the route from the Alapaha to the Flint River to be farther south. For instance, another route would be to leave the Alapaha River a little west of the confluence of that river with Willacoochee Creek and pass between the cities of Alapaha and Nashville, going across the northern end of Cook County and reaching the Flint River near Baconton.

Taking everything into consideration, this is one of the best routes, if not the best, yet suggested.

TASK FOR ENGINEERS

At last, the location of the canal is the task of the Army Engineers.

TAXATION

In every discussion of the awful depression in which we find ourselves there arises the question of taxation. I have stated my position on this subject so often until I will now only repeat briefly that the heaviest tax burden on my people is that of State, county, and city taxes. In fact, the State of Georgia and many other States get more money out of the Federal Government than the Government taxes out of them.

Listen at this statement from the Treasury Department as to the amount Georgia paid to the Federal Government and received from Federal Government last fiscal year. This statement is as follows:

Government contributions to Georgia

Navy Department	$67,588.00
Post Office Department	13,796,611.98
Commerce Department	443,488.00
Department of Justice	547,152.42
Public Buildings	1,391,669.01
Rivers and Harbors	1,685,530.63
Veterans' Bureau	11,597,000.00
War Department	17,039,739.00
Department of Agriculture	11,807,576.00
Total	58,376,355.04

Georgia contributions to Government

Estate tax	$118,756.42
Alcoholic beverages	225.00
Tobacco	50,429.00
Oleomargarine	23,714.42
Documentary stamps	40,505.00
Narcotics	8,787.00
Theaters	76,702.00
Income taxes	2,174,464.82
Corporation taxes	2,754,590.00
Stamps, money-orders, etc	8,835,203.66
Total	14,083,377.32

Thus it will be seen Georgia, during the last fiscal year, received $44,292,977.72 more from the Federal Government than was paid out by the people of Georgia in Federal taxes. This happens because, by far the largest part of Federal income, inheritance and estate taxes come from the very wealthy in the big money centers.

I am most anxious to relieve my people of a large part of the local-tax burden. For this reason I am fighting for a Federal constitutional amendment to give every head of a family a reasonable amount of land and personalty, for home purposes, free of all taxes.

For this same reason, I bitterly opposed the Federal Government's going into the States and levying a general sales tax or other vicious excise taxes. I am very much opposed to the Federal electrical energy tax, the gasoline tax and all the provisions of the recent tax bill. I made my position clear on this some time ago. I am so anxious to help bring real relief to our people who are suffering so much. I do not see how anyone can be happy while the farmers are losing their homes by foreclosure. This must be stopped. I pledge all that I am and ever hope to be to these principles and hope yet to be able to help bring them to a successful fruition.

THE REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN IS FINANCED OUT OF THE TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, supplementing my remarks on the floor of the House on July 12, 1932, concerning the proposed investigation of the Treasury Department, I desire to lay the following information before this House and the country.

During the fiscal years 1923 to 1931, inclusive, the Treasury Department paid out in tax refunds in cash the sum of $1,219,486,515. During the same years it allowed tax credits and abatements in the sum of $2,323,688,107. This makes a total in cash refunds, credits, and abatements allowed during the nine fiscal years to which I have referred of $3,543,174,622. Final figures for 1932 are not yet available, but I learn from the highest authority that cash refunds for 1932 were approximately $80,000,000, which was about $11,000,000 more than the cash refunds during the fiscal year 1931. In all probability the credits and abatements for the fiscal year 1932 will be proportionately larger than during 1931, so that it may be said that during the last 10 years tax cash refunds, credits, and abatements amounting to almost $4,000,000,000 have been given back by the Treasury to taxpayers, most of them in the ultrarich class or large corporations. This is a larger sum than the accumulated Hoover administration Federal deficit for the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 and is enough money to pay the operating expenses of the Government for an entire year.

I mention a few of the corporations which have profited from this extremely generous tax-refund policy of the Republican administrations. In 1930 a list of corporations which had received some of the large refunds was published. Some of them have received additional refunds since that time. Among them was the United States Steel Corporation, which alone has received refunds and credits amounting to approximately $100,000,000. The Steel Corporation, incidentally, has also been one of the greatest beneficiaries of the tariff policy of the Coolidge and Hoover administrations. The Middle States Oil Co. of New York received refunds amounting to $4,400,000. The Baldwin Locomotive Works, of Pennsylvania, got back $3,700,000 of its tax money. The Eastman Kodak Co., of Rochester, received refunds totaling more than $2,500,000. The American Window Glass Co., a Pittsburgh corporation, got refunds of $2,100,000. Another famous corporation, the Aluminum Corporation of America, owned principally by the family of that greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton, Andrew W. Mellon, received refunds of more than $1,250,000.

Among the refunds allowed as late as last January was one of $608,274 to the Sinclair Oil companies, whose head is Harry Sinclair, who will be remembered as having turned over $100,000 of the bonds of his company to Will Hays when he was chairman of the Republican National Committee with which to help pay off the Republican Party's campaign debt of a few years ago.

Jurisdiction of their refunds is wholly in the Treasury Department and nobody outside of the department is in possession of the facts. However, it is very strange that giant corporations such as I have mentioned, which retain the very best legal talent obtainable and the most expert tax accountants, would make such large tax payments if they did not actually owe the money to the Government and then take a chance on getting their money back.

It is of interest to note that up to 1928, of all the tax refunds allowed, 83 per cent involved claims on taxes paid to the Treasury during the years 1917 to 1921, under the war revenue act of the Woodrow Wilson administration. In other words, the Wilson administration collected this money through a war excess-profits tax with which to pay the cost of winning the war and succeeding Republican administrations gave it back to wealthy individuals and large corporations very many of whom were large contributors to Republican campaign funds.

It is also extremely significant that most of these large sums of money were returned after a Republican Congress, with the approval of Secretary Mellon, changed the law so as to permit refunds of taxes voluntarily paid. Prior to 1924 refunds could be allowed only on such taxes as were paid under protest. Mr. Mellon and the Republican Congress of that year changed the law so as to allow a claim to be filed on any tax payment, regardless of whether or not it was paid under protest. This opened the vaults of the Treasury, with the result that during the last 10 years nearly $4,000,000,000 of the public money has been given back to wealthy individuals and giant corporations, and a very great deal of it has been paid to men who have been the most lavish contributors to the campaign funds used to elect President Coolidge and President Hoover.

Something more than a year ago the present Speaker of the House, then minority leader, Mr. GARNER, made a public statement in which he showed that there was a close bond of sympathy between Republican campaign contributions and Treasury tax refunds. Mr. GARNER showed that of a list of 17 individuals making $10,000 contributions to the Republican war chest, all of them had benefited very greatly under the extremely liberal tax-refund policy of the Treasury Department. Mr. GARNER also called attention to the fact that after Senator FESS was appointed chairman of the Republican National Committee, he named Robert H. Lucas as executive officer of that committee, a position which I believe he still holds. Prior to such appointment Mr. Lucas was Commissioner of the Bureau of Internal Revenue by appointment of President Hoover. This is the bureau in which tax-refund cases are handled.

About the same time, Senator DILL, of Washington, made a public statement on his responsibility as a Senator, a statement which has never been challenged, in which he showed that 24 men who contributed a total of $477,000 to the 1928 campaign fund of the Hoover-Curtis ticket had received in tax refunds the sum of $114,655,279. These included, Senator DILL showed, contributions from copper, steel, oil, banking, and other interests so dominant in the economic life of the Nation. Senator DILL made public the list of these men, together with their contributions to the Hoover-Curtis war chest of 1928, and also the refunds, credits, and so forth, received from the Treasury Department, either by themselves as individuals, or by corporations in which they are dominant figures. They include:

Harry Guggenheim, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $210,555.

Jeremiah Milbank, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refund, $891,443.

John N. Willys, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refund, $677,567. In addition, Mr. Willys was honored with the ambassadorship to Poland, as Mr. Guggenheim had been to Cuba.

W. R. and H. M. Timken, campaign contributions, $10,000; tax refunds, $370,031.

O. P. and M. J. Van Sweringen, campaign contributions, $32,500 each; tax refunds, $353,364.

John D. Rockefeller and John D. Rockefeller, jr., campaign contributions, $25,000; tax refunds, $8,545,309.

Herbert N. Straus, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $86,736.

William Nelson Cromwell, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $222,652.

J. R. Nutt, treasurer Republican National Committee, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $83,669.

Harvey S. Firestone, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $2,960,000.

Charles Hayden, campaign contribution, $25,000; tax refunds, $1,876,000.

The late George F. Baker, campaign contribution, $20,000; the United States Steel and other corporations in which Mr. Baker was a director, having received tax refunds approximating $100,000,000.

Why, Mr. Speaker, almost simultaneously with my talk on the floor last Tuesday, the Treasury Department was granting a refund of $135,672 on taxes of 1918 to the Ohio Steel Foundry Co. of Lima, Ohio, whose president, Mr. John E. Galvin, is one of the largest contributors in Ohio to the Republican campaign fund. Incidentally Mr. Galvin is also a member of the Federal Reserve Board of the Cleveland district. Just prior to the announcement of this refund, Mr. Galvin "conferred" in Washington with Ohio's senior Senator, the recent chairman of the Republican National Committee, and with the Republican Representative from the fourth Ohio district.

I am reliably informed that other refunds for taxes going back as far as the year 1917 are in the process of being granted, and the red tape is being unwound so that they may be available before the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

Because the list of refunds of over $20,000 run into the thousands it is impossible to set them all forth. The following lists, however, give refunds of over $500,000 from 1927 to date.

DEMOCRATIC HOUSE MAJORITY FACES INDICTMENT

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a recapitulation of the record made by the Democratic House of Representatives at this session is an indictment of the fidelity of that party to the national welfare. I do not charge individual Democrats with deliberate intent to endanger the Government or wrong the people. I do, however, charge that the collective incapacity of that party in the House has resulted in blunders whose consequence are equivalent to crimes against the Government and the people. As a party all Democrats must face the indictment. The people as a national jury will try the Democratic Party on this indictment.

TEMPORARY COOPERATION WITH REPUBLICANS

When this session began the Democratic leaders in Congress seemed to feel the sense of responsibility which should accompany possession of power. Solemn assurances were given that there would be faithful cooperation in dealing with measures calculated to relieve the depression. Republicans in the House cheerfully accepted these assurances and refrained from any act that could be construed as obstructing the majority in perfecting its organization. There was to be a cessation of partisanship for the sake of the common welfare. Democrats and Republicans labored faithfully in the committees and brought out measures calculated to expedite the balancing of the Budget, the trimming down of appropriations, the avoidance of new expenditures and the imposition of taxes.

PRESIDENT HOOVER'S THE ONLY CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAM

Contrary to expectation and promise, the Democratic Party did not present any program for the relief of national distress. The only program presented was that offered by President Hoover. Democratic leaders pretended to accept this program, and for a while they gave their cooperation in transforming the program into law. But their cooperation was never whole-hearted, and soon they resorted to partisan efforts to disrupt the program.

To the extent that the Democratic Party did cooperate in relief legislation they are entitled to full credit. No one has ever denied them this credit. President Hoover scrupulously avoided partisanship throughout the session, and always accorded to the Democratic Party full credit whenever it avoided partisanship in order to expedite relief legislation.

President Hoover's program of relief legislation was comprehensive and constructive. His recommendations, as he stated in his special message to Congress in January, were largely developed in consultation with leading men of both parties, of agriculture, of labor, of banking, and of industry. They had no partisan character.

Of the eight points embraced in President Hoover's plan six have been enacted into law, not in each instance as he desired, the notable exception being the tax bill and the economy bill, both of which he approved in principle but not in all their details.

The other points in the President's plan which Congress enacted into law were—

The creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the period of the emergency to furnish credit otherwise unobtainable under existing circumstances and so give confidence to agriculture, to industry, and to labor against further paralyzing influences and shocks, but especially by the reopening of credit channels to insure maintenance and normal working of the commercial fabric.

The strengthening of the Federal land bank in the interest of the farmer; and

For the enlargement, under full safeguards, of the discount facilities of the Federal reserve banks in the interest of a more adequate credit system.

And doubtless before Congress adjourns the bill which has passed the House to provide assistance to home owners through the creation of a system of home-loan discount banks, which was also a part of the President's plan, will become a law.

Already these measures have produced beneficial results, and when Congress adjourns and their provisions are more fully understood and applied I predict they will restore confidence in the country to the extent that it is possible for legislation to do so.

No more constructive program was ever devised than the one wrought out by President Hoover.

DEMOCRATIC BREAKDOWN ON TAX BILL—MILLIONS OF REVENUE LOST

The first breakdown of leadership and party discipline in the House resulted in long delay in the balancing of the Budget. If the tax bill had been pushed through when it was unanimously reported by the Ways and Means Committee, the Treasury would have received millions of dollars in tax revenue. It was within the power of the Democratic Party to pass this bill. It failed miserably, both in leadership and in discipline. The Government and the people were the victims of this incapacity. The breakdown was equivalent to the taking of millions of dollars from the Treasury.

DEMOCRATIC HOUSE PREACHED ECONOMY—PRACTICED EXTRAVAGANCE

Coincident with the necessity for raising revenue was the necessity for economizing. Again, the Democratic House of Representatives committed a blunder as damaging as a crime. It preached economy but practiced extravagance. It brought forth a bill purporting to effect economies to the extent of $200,000,000. Then an obstinate House struck out one item after another until the alleged economy total was only about $45,000,000. As finally passed, after radical revision by the Senate, the bill represented, on the whole, an unscientific method of dealing with the delicate mechanism of the Government's vast business.

It would have been much more businesslike and effective, in my judgment, if the Democratic House, in the first place, had accepted President Hoover's urgent recommendations, repeatedly made, to reorganize the departments scientifically and thus effect economies. The President was willing to be responsible for this task, subject to the approval of Congress. But the Democratic House of Representatives, in a spirit of partisanship, denied the President's request and, instead, set up a partisan committee to bring in a plan. This plan became a political football, caused needless delay, and to a great extent was abortive.

In the midst of pretended efforts to economize, the Democratic House passed a bill virtually making a gift of $132,000,000 to the States for highway construction, and tried to distribute this largess to Democratic States and districts. The bill was so extravagant and unjust that it was never considered in another body, and it was well known that if enacted it would have been vetoed.

By Democratic votes a grossly improper pension bill was passed, which granted annuities to individuals who had been deserters, or who had never been in the military service. President Hoover vetoed the bill, and Democrats did not attempt to pass it over his veto.

Extravagant claims will be made, in fact, already have been made, of vast savings by pruning the appropriation bills below the Budget estimates. True it is that those bills were slashed and cut in a most ruthless and unscientific manner, and without regard to the actual needs of the service in the fiscal year 1933, just to make an artificial and unreal showing of economy before the election. But mark my word, the actual reductions representing real savings will be found to be negligible, and I predict that the alleged savings will be carried in deficiency bills at the next session after the November election. These alleged economies were mere postponements of obligations which will have to be met with deficiency appropriations. The Democratic claim to be the party of economy is entirely a fiction. What Bagehot said of the English Parliament has been peculiarly true of this Democratic House of Representatives:

> If you want to raise a certain cheer in the House of Commons, make a general panegyric on economy. If you want to invite sure defeat, propose a particular saving.

If I were faithfully to describe this Democratic House on the subject of economy I would give it the appellation of the "bung and spigot" House, wasteful at the bung and saving at the spigot.

APPROPRIATIONS DELAYED—A DEMOCRATIC HABIT

Delay in the passage of the annual appropriation bills is a Democratic habit whenever that party is in control of the House. The present session is no exception. Democratic history is repeating itself. A new fiscal year has begun and yet not all of the appropriation bills have been passed.

When the Democratic Party was in control of Congress during the two Wilson administrations and at other times the passage of the necessary appropriation bills was delayed beyond July 1 and resolutions of extension were required. Such delay occasions great inconvenience and expense to all the departments, hinders making plans in advance, complicates accounts, and prevents allotting of funds equitably. The earlier these bills are passed the more advantageous can the departments expend their appropriations.

Failure promptly to pass these supply bills is a mark of dilatoriness and incapacity, and is an admission of incompetency; but it is a regular habit of Democratic administrations.

On the other hand, during Republican control of the House the annual appropriation bills were prepared with diligence and were invariably enacted into law before the beginning of each fiscal year. Every branch of the Government knew in advance just what measure of expenditure was allotted to it for the year, thus enabling them to perform their respective functions without intervals of uncertainty, indecision, and waste. How different have been the conditions when the Democratic Party has controlled this House. It seems to be Democratic nature to be inefficient and unbusinesslike. For as soon as the Democratic Party gains power again they repeat their former practice and illustrate again what we have always criticized them for—inefficiency and incapacity for business management.

FANTASTIC DEMOCRATIC PROPOSALS

The Democrats of the House expressed great resentment against Government competition with private enterprise and appointed a committee to investigate the alleged evil. Then these Democrats voted for the Muscle Shoals bill, which would put the Government into competition with private enterprise.

As the session wore on Democrats in the House abandoned all pretense of cooperating for the general welfare. They advocated one fantastic measure after another, and passed some of them. If any one of these measures had become law, it would have demoralized the United States. Among them were the bill to guarantee bank deposits, the bill to compel the Federal Reserve Board to raise the price of commodities, the bill to give foreign governments a voice in the fixing of American tariff duties, and other equally absurd proposals.

BONUS BILL—VETERANS MISLED BY DEMAGOGY

Two crowning acts of folly, however, were reserved for the last. Throughout the session a few Democratic Members had harped upon the necessity of paying veterans $2,400,000,000 under the pretense that the money was due them and that it would contribute to the relief of the depression to distribute it among them. The adjusted-compensation certificates will not become due until 1945, and even if they were due now there is no money in the Treasury with which to pay them. The Democrats who championed this bill were not deterred by these facts. They boldly advocated the creation of fiat or counterfeit money to be distributed to the veterans. By every art of suggestion the demagogues who sponsored this atrocious measure persuaded thousands of veterans to come to Washington. They came, penniless and hungry, and here they are encamped, a menace to the peace and health of themselves and the people of Washington and the Nation.

GARNER "PORK BARREL" BILL

Desperately seeking some method whereby Democrats could wrest from President Hoover the credit for devising an effective emergency relief program, the Speaker of the House personally sponsored a bill which Mr. Hoover rightly described as the "most gigantic pork barrel in the history of the country." By the whip and spur of the caucus, the Democrats of the House were bound to support it, although many of them foresaw that it would contribute to the ruin of their party's claim of capacity to administer the Government.

The sum total of debt and taxation which would be saddled upon the people by the original Garner pork-barrel bill is so staggering that it belongs in the category of grotesque satire instead of legislation actually proposed in Congress. Extravagant sums were proposed for public buildings which are not needed and which the communities supposed to be benefited have declared they do not desire. In order to avoid a bond issue the Garner bill proposed to saddle an extraordinary and additional heavy tax upon gasoline. If this tax were imposed, it would encroach upon the revenue of the States, which maintain their highway systems largely by the tax on gasoline. The Democratic Speaker would force a class composed of motorists to finance the building of unnecessary structures in all parts of the United States.

BLUNDER AFTER BLUNDER

As if pursued by a malignant fate, Democratic leaders of the House became involved in one blunder after another during the session, culminating in the astounding attempt to deceive the people in the matter of unemployment relief. The demagogic appeal of the Speaker of the House, ostensibly in behalf of the "common man" but actually for the purpose of misrepresenting President Hoover's position, by making it appear that he favored the rich few as against the unemployed many, had the reaction that might have been expected. President Hoover's determined resistance to the proposal to set the Government up as a banker and pawnbroker resulted in the defeat of that crazy proposal, with corresponding embarrassment to all who championed it.

GRAVY DRIPPINGS

The distinguished Democrat who presides over this House will be followed through the campaign with the derision of citizens who refused to be deceived by his protestations in behalf of the common man. When the Speaker demanded that some of the "drippings" from the Reconstruction Corporation should seep through to the common people he revealed how his thoughts dwelt continually upon pork and the savory gravy that garnishes political pork. Although he was compelled by public protest to abandon his gigantic public building pork proposal, he clung desperately to the scheme for the distribution of pork in the form of loans to individuals by the Reconstruction Corporation; not loans for relief of unemployment, mind you, but just pure outpourings of gravy from the reservoir of public credit to anybody willing to give a promissory note.

If the interpretation placed upon the language in Title II of the bill by Speaker GARNER to the effect that individuals could borrow from the Federal Treasury is a correct interpretation then it is the most monstrous, uneconomic proposal ever submitted, and carries its own condemnation. But, if Speaker GARNER's interpretation is false then he is guilty of an attempt to deceive the unwary and uninformed, and his proposition is therefore a political gesture and nothing more. It is inconceivable that even political expediency could beget such an indefensible measure.

A MELANCHOLY HISTORY

This brilliant scheme for supporting the people on Government money was riddled by President Hoover and expunged from the unemployment relief bill. But it remains to haunt the Speaker throughout his campaign for Vice Presidency. It has destroyed his prestige as a framer of sound legislation. It stands preeminent as the most unwise and most improvident proposal ever made to Congress, even by a Democrat. The Democratic nominee for President could not stomach the plan of his running mate, although Governor Roosevelt has shown that the mere weakness and fallacy of a nostrum do not prevent him from advocating one if he thinks it will win the votes of guileless citizens.

The record of this session shows that whenever the Democrats of the House departed from President Hoover's program for the relief of the depression they adopted one fantastic scheme after another, only to have them set aside by public opinion.

The Democratic Party has a majority on all committees of this House. That party assumed responsibility to the country for the shaping of legislation here. The melancholy roll of futile bills passed by the majority, or killed off by public opinion, tells the history of the debacle of the House under Democratic rule.

A REPUBLICAN CONTRAST—SANE LEADERSHIP

Under the régime of the late Nicholas Longworth and his Republican predecessors and associates the House of Representatives became a great deliberative body, vigilant, prompt in action, and statesmanlike in its decisions. The people looked to this House as the safe anchor of public stability. Accordingly, when the Democratic majority took control they had the opportunity to maintain the dignity and reputation of the House by merely adopting the model of sane leadership which had made the House great and respected.

But, yielding to the temptation to play politics with public measures, even at the risk of disabling the operations of government, the Democratic leaders and their deluded followers ruined the reputation of the House as a safe deliberative body. It is now scorned and derided by the public, and conscientious Members are unjustly suffering for the sins of the majority.

Instead of accepting the judgments of this House as wise, the people of the United States now look upon its acts with dread and suspicion. The House has never before earned the contempt of the public.

AN ORGY OF DEMOCRATIC DELIRIUM

I shall not go into further details in discussing the reasons why the House under Democratic misrule has sunk to such disrepute. It is enough to point to the inexcusable delay in balancing the Budget; the political jockeying which made a mockery of the so-called economy bill; the insincerity of Democrats who harped upon tariff injustice and then demanded special tariff legislation favorable to products of their States; the attempt to emasculate the law which provides for equitable adjustment of tariff rates, in order to play politics with public revenue; the folly of the attempt to throw open to foreign governments the right to participate in shaping American tariff policy; the effort to defraud the public and the veterans by floating $2,400.-000,000 of adulterated money; the attempt to penalize honest bankers by making them responsible for dishonesty and crookedness in rotten banks; the crazy scheme for compelling the Federal Reserve Board to nullify natural law and boost the prices of commodities; the crafty plan to distribute $132,000,000 of public money to favored States for road purposes at the expense of other States; the gigantic Garner pork-barrel scheme, unequaled in history for its size and folly, except for the still more monstrous plan which Speaker GARNER would have foisted upon the country, whereby the people's money would have been handed out to all individuals who cared to borrow.

Thus, from bad to worse, the Democratic House staggered like a drunken man through the months of this session, winding up with the orgy of delirium which has just astounded and disgusted the country.

THE SPEAKER'S OVERWEENING AMBITION

The allegation is freely made that these wild departures from sane legislation were inspired by the ambition of the distinguished Speaker to attain the Presidency. It is contended that this ambition could not hope to reach the goal so long as the Speaker cooperated with the Republican President in an unselfish effort to devise legislation without political taint. Therefore, yielding to ambition, the Speaker is said to have made up his mind to oppose and obstruct the President, even if it were necessary to espouse foolish or ruinously costly legislation to do it. Since the President had worked out with his advisers—some of them unselfish and patriotic Democrats—the only legislation practically adaptable to the national emergency, it was necessary for the Speaker to adopt unwise and impracticable schemes.

The Democratic National Convention came on. The ambition of the distinguished Speaker was not gratified by nomination for the Presidency, but he was duly rewarded for stepping aside by being nominated for Vice President. There was nothing else to do but to accept, in view of the fact that the Speaker had lost control of the House and could not hope to repair his damaged prestige in this body.

We can find no fault in ambition which seeks just rewards for exceptional public services; but what shall we say of ambition which demands a reward for failure? What is a suitable reward for frantic efforts to fasten bad legislation upon the Nation? Is not defeat the best and most effective reward?

As surely as the people will reward with preferment a legislator who perfects sound legislation so surely will they rebuke one who insists upon unsound legislation as a means of promoting his political ambition.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM REPUDIATES DEMOCRATIC RECORD IN THE HOUSE

The platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention at Chicago and the record of the Democratic Party during the session now coming to a close afford an excellent opportunity for the American people to compare words with acts. The platform is full of flattering promises. The actual record of Democratic control of the House is full of broken promises and failures.

If the Democratic Party is proud of the record that has been made, why is the platform silent? If that party is ashamed of the record it has made in the House, why does it not acknowledge that it can not perform what it promises?

It is no small matter when a political party is given control of a branch of Congress. The people risk their lives, property, and happiness when they commit to any party the power over the purse and the sword. They have a right to demand an accounting. The Democratic National Convention was guilty of cowardly evasion when it failed to render an accounting of the acts of the Democratic Party in the House.

The sins of the Democratic leaders and followers of this House follow the Democratic Party into the campaign. The Democratic National Convention did not dare to refer to the folly of the party's representatives here. The convention directly and indirectly repudiated the record of the party in its control of a coordinate branch of Congress. It directly repudiated the bonus bill, and it refused to indorse other Democratic measures.

The Democratic Party says in effect to the people of the United States:

We denounce the Republican President for legislation which we helped him to pass; therefore we ask your support.

We tried to enact unwise legislation inspired by politicians who thought they could make political capital by opposing nonpartisan measures; therefore we ask you to elect them.

We made a botch of governing the House of Representatives; therefore we ask you to give us control of the entire Government.

We offer for Vice President the Speaker who failed to control the House; therefore we ask you to put him in control of the Senate.

We supported emergency legislation proposed by President Hoover because the public demanded it; therefore we ask you to give us power to repeal this legislation.

We have no program for dealing with the depression, but our nominee for President advocates bold experiments; therefore we ask permission to experiment on you.

We admit that President Hoover offered a program and that we supported it; therefore we ask you to defeat him before the program can be completed.

Although the Democratic platform, by its silence, repudiated the Democratic record in the House of Representatives, the Republican platform justly condemned that record in no uncertain tones under the dismal but absolutely true caption of—

DEMOCRATIC FAILURE

The vagaries of the present Democratic House of Representatives offer characteristic and appalling proof of the existing incapacity of that party for leadership in a national crisis. Individualism running amuck has displaced party discipline and has trampled under foot party leadership. A bewildered electorate has viewed the spectacle with profound dismay and deep misgivings. Goaded to desperation by their confessed failure, the party leaders have resorted to "pork-barrel" legislation to obtain a unity of action which could not otherwise be achieved. A Republican President stands resolutely between the helpless citizen and the disasters threatened by such measures; and the people, regardless of party, will demand his continued service. Many times during his useful life has Herbert Hoover responded to such a call, and his response has never disappointed. He will not disappoint us now.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, a little over a decade ago the Republican Party assumed control in all departments of the Government. The backwash of the war accomplished this result. At that time, and as a result of eight years of Democratic control, our factories were running in two shifts, day and night; our farmers were receiving the largest prices for their products they ever received; our mines were all operating, and there was no unemployment. There had been practically no bank failures.

CONDITIONS NOW

Ten million men walk the streets of our cities unemployed. Half of our factories are idle. Half of our coal mines have shut down. Yesterday wheat reached a low "all time" record. It takes two wagonloads of farm products to buy what one wagonload would buy in 1920.

From every hand comes the crash of failing banks. Our national income from all sources has been cut practically 50 per cent. The expenses of our Federal Government have almost doubled since the Wilson administration. Eight thousand banks have failed and more will fail in the immediate future.

Armies of unemployed are converging on the National Capital.

During the fiscal year which has just closed, in order to keep the Federal Government going, under the Hoover administration, we were compelled to spend almost $3,000,000,000 more than our revenues amounted to, and this enormous sum has been added to the national debt. To propose to collect it by taxes would be impossible. We have handed it on to the future years, and, perhaps, for another generation to pay. This is the largest deficit in the history of nations.

We have more unemployed than there is in all of Europe outside of Russia, and there are no unemployed in Russia. We are threatened with bread riots of the unemployed in our great cities.

Conditions have never been as bad as they are now. Yet they comfort us with the assurance that they might be worse. They might be worse, and they will be worse if the Republicans are again restored to power.

OUR PRESENT ECONOMIC CONDITION

Statistics are now available which show an unfavorable balance of trade—a balance against us—for the month of June of $6,000,000. Our exports for the month of June were lower than they have been for any month since 1914. Our exports dropped for June to a total of only $115,000,000 after France made wider use of her quota system.

Last week 35 banks closed with estimated deposits of $22,000,000, an increase of eight over the preceding week, according to the American Banker.

The National Capital had its first banking casualties. On Thursday of last week three banks in Washington failed.

Nine hundred and eight banks have closed this year, a record for all time. For the same period in 1931, 740 banks failed. The deposit liabilities of banks so far closed this year are estimated at nearly $506,000,000.

So far this year only 151 banks have reopened. For the corresponding period of last year 188 banks reopened.

All this indicates that our financial condition is growing worse.

While all this has been happening our money circulation increased during the month of June $216,000,000. During the present calendar year our money circulation has increased $874,000,000. The total volume in money in circulation on June 30 of this year was nearly $6,000,000,000, a record for all time.

Practically all dividends of our great corporations have been cut, most of them 50 per cent, and many of them have been suspended entirely. Stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange and all other exchanges every day reach new record lows.

The decrease in individual account debits, as shown in the last Federal weekly bank report covering the period of this calendar year up to July 15, shows a reduction of from approximately $10,000,000,000 to approximately $6,000,000,000, a decrease of $4,000,000,000 under the same period in 1931.

WHAT WE ARE DOING TO REMEDY THE SITUATION

We have just passed the home loan bank bill with the Glass amendment, evidently put on the bill in the first instance for the purpose of killing it. The President agreed to it. This means a still further expansion which may possibly reach a total of $1,000,000,000.

Under it national banks have the right to deposit Federal bonds drawing 3⅜ per cent interest and less, and on this deposit they can issue the face of their bonds in circulating notes while they still continue to draw interest on their bonds; and the only charge for this privilege is a very slight charge against them for expenses, such as the charge for printing the notes in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

At the present time the only bonds which have the circulating privilege are Federal bonds drawing 2 per cent, and banks have taken up $700,000,000 worth of these 2 per cent bonds for this purpose. The effect in the near future will be that the $700,000,000 worth of 2 per cent bonds held by the national banks will depreciate in value, and it is not an extravagant assumption that these bonds may depreciate 40 per cent, with a consequent direct loss to national banks of nearly $300,000,000. If this happens, it will result in a still greater number of failures among national banks. Many of them can not stand this loss.

Those banks which now hold bonds drawing 3⅜ per cent and over 2 per cent can use those bonds as a basis for their circulation and still draw a higher rate of interest than they now draw. It is conceivable that many banks will avail themselves of this privilege. There are $3,000,000,000 of this class of bonds now outstanding. Many national banks, probably the majority of them, now owe money. Many of them are in danger of runs. In fact, all of them are. The temptation to deposit their bonds for the circulation privilege in order to use the money they can circulate against them to pay their own debts or to insure themselves against runs will be irresistible, and it can readily be seen that an additional expansion in our circulating medium to a total of $7,000,000,000 is in sight.

There are those who believe that this is desirable, but the fact remains that an increase in our circulating medium of nearly this much for the present calendar year up until the present time has resulted in no price gain to farmers, and has not started a single factory. Money is evidently being hoarded. It does not circulate and it requires a restoration of confidence before it will circulate.

Our national debt has been enormously increased under the Hoover administration and it is still increasing.

We have created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with $2,000,000,000 capital, to which the Treasury subscribed $500,000,000, and we made an appropriation of that amount when we did not have that much money in the Treasury. It was authorized to issue debentures to the amount of $1,500,000,000, and we have just doubled that authorization. Already this corporation has loaned over $1,000,000,000 to banks and railroads and insurance companies. It can not sell its debentures on the market and the Treasury takes them at 3½ per cent, and all the money we have so far contributed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we get by borrowings of the Treasury Department.

The Treasury Department is able to sell its 1-year notes at an interest charge of considerably less than 1 per cent per annum, but every time the Treasury sells $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 worth of these short-term notes that much money is taken out of the taxable funds and reduces the incomes of States, counties, and municipalities of the Federal Government. These notes are tax free, and the incomes of the Federal Government, the States, the counties, and municipalities are continually growing less. This makes an additional charge upon them. I wonder how long this can last.

TAXES AND THE BUDGET

In order to effect economies in the administration of the Federal Government, we have reduced the Budget for the fiscal year 1933, $1,100,000,000 under the Budget for 1932. The Democratic Congress is responsible for initiating all of the bills which made this enormous reduction possible.

Notwithstanding this reduction, we have been compelled to add to our taxes $1,200,000,000 for the present fiscal year, and a large part of this consists of irritating taxes worse than any imposed in war times. We were not compelled even in the period of the World War to require stamps on checks. We are now compelled to resort to that exceedingly objectionable method of taxation; but notwithstanding all these additional taxes and all cuts in expenses of the Federal Government, we now have another deficit facing us, and we have just entered upon the present fiscal year. It is admitted that we have a deficit of $150,000,000, and to this must be added $269,000,000 which the allied nations will owe us this year and for which they were kindly given a moratorium last year by the President of the United States. In other words, there is a deficit in sight now for this year of $419,000,000, and this will increase with each passing day.

At the close of the last fiscal year we were operating this Government and spending $7,000,000 every day more than we collected from our various revenue resources.

Farms can not be sold at all at the present time. Recently one-fourth of one of our great States was sold for taxes. Mortgages are being foreclosed every day.

I am wondering what the people are going to do about it in the approaching elections. It is perfectly evident what they ought to do about it. No party in the country has ever made a worse record than the Republican Party has made under the last three administrations, and especially under the administration of President Hoover and under his vacillating, indecisive leadership.

DOLES

The remedy for it all, in the opinion of Mr. Hoover, and Republican Party leaders follow him blindly, is doles, and we have carried out this policy during the present Congress. Mr. Hoover has given doles to big banks, doles to railroads, doles to insurance companies, doles to Federal farm-loan banks, but the Federal farm-loan banks are still required for the loans they make to charge crushing rates of interest to farmers, and this is all we have done so far under President Hoover's leadership. Not one bill has been passed which tends in any sufficient measure to remedy conditions for which he and his advisers and the two preceding Republican administrations are directly responsible.

Mr. Hoover and Secretary Mellon and Assistant Secretary Mills, now Secretary of the Treasury, and the other leaders of high finance who advise the President were unable, any of them, to see the aproaching depression. May I quote from some of them in order to show the failure of leadership which has resulted in the present depression?

In his final message to Congress on December 4, 1928, President Coolidge said:

> No Congress of the United States ever assembled, on surveying the state of the Union, has met with a more pleasing prospect than that which appears at the present time.

On October 24, 1928, at Paterson, N. J., Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS, at that time Secretary of Labor, now a Senator from Pennsylvania and one of Mr. Hoover's advisers, stated:

> The single issue in the presidential campaign is, How can we best maintain and increase prosperity in America, and who is the man to do it?

On the same day at Rochester, N. Y., Charles Curtis, then and now a vice presidential candidate, said:

> The only issue in this campaign is the continued prosperity of the American people.

On October 24, 1928, at Chicago, Ill., Charles Evans Hughes, in his speech, said:

> I believe that it is very important in maintaining the confidence that underlies our prosperity that we should retain a Republican administration.

On October 5, 1928, Charles Curtis, then and now a vice presidential candidate, at Gary, Ind., said:

> Stick to the full dinner pail. You have been enjoying Republican prosperity. If you want to continue the prosperity of the administration of Calvin Coolidge, vote for Hoover.

On September 17, 1928, Roger W. Babson, a supposed economist, said:

> The election of Hoover and a Republican Congress should result in continued prosperity for 1929.

On August 11, 1928, in his speech of acceptance of the Republican nomination in California, Herbert Hoover said:

> Unemployment in the sense of distress is widely disappearing. * * * We in America to-day are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land.

A heading in the New York Times of October 12, 1928, reads, "Mellon appeals for Hoover victory as prosperity aid."

In Mr. Hoover's speech at San Francisco on July 27, 1928, he said:

> The outlook for the world to-day is for the greatest era of commercial expansion in history. The rest of the world will become better customers.

On October 25, 1929, in his press release President Hoover said:

> The fundamental business of the country, that is, production and distribution of commodities, is on a sound and prosperous basis.

I read from the New York Herald Tribune of October 24, 1929, the following heading: "Stocks off five billion in severest break of Wall Street history."

I read a heading in the New York World of November 13, 1929, "Stocks crumble to lowest levels."

In November, 1929, William Randolph Hearst said in his newspapers:

> Some reassuring utterance by the President of the United States * * * would do much to restore the confidence of the public.

And President Hoover responded with the following statement:

> Any lack of confidence in the economic future or the basic strength of business in the United States is foolish.

In his message to Congress of December, 1930, President Hoover said:

> Economic depression can not be cured by legislative action or Executive pronouncement.

I read from a New York Herald Tribune heading of January 24, 1930, "Trade recovery now complete, President told."

On March 8, 1930, a Washington dispatch quotes President Hoover as predicting—

> That the worst effect of the crash upon unemployment will have been passed during the next 60 days.

I read from a Washington dispatch of October 20, 1930:

> President Hoover to-day designated Robert W. Lamont, Secretary of Commerce, as chairman of the President's special committee on unemployment.

A Washington dispatch of October 21, 1930, states:

> President Hoover has summoned Col. Arthur Woods to help place 2,500,000 persons back to work this winter.

In September, 1928, Secretary Mellon said:

There is no cause for worry. The high tide of prosperity will continue.

On December 5, 1929, Andrew W. Mellon stated:

The Government's business is in sound condition.

On October 1, 1931, Mr. Mellon's Aluminum Co. of America and subsidiaries—controlled by the Mellon family—reduced wages of all employees 10 per cent, effective October 1, 1931.

I quote from a heading in the New York Times of June 13, 1931, "Lamont plans cuts in his department. He urges division heads to reduce personnel in economy campaign."

On September 23, 1931, in a heading in the New York Times it was stated, "United States Steel and Bethlehem to cut wages 10 per cent October 1."

This headline appeared in all papers.

On January 14, 1931, the New York Times heading read, "Thirty-six million dollars bonuses by Bethlehem Steel are attacked in suit."

On January 30, 1931, a New York Herald Tribune heading read, Bethlehem net in 1930 drops to $5.25 a share. Leaves deficit of $2,356,594 after dividend payments."

I might continue indefinitely these quotations. They show an absolute failure of leadership in Mr. Hoover and his advisers. They did not know the crash was coming. They denied it. They boosted stocks at every opportunity, and the lows of 1929 have gone still lower. There has been an absolute failure of leadership.

It seems an impossible assumption that the people of the United States can be longer deceived as to the effect of the Republican policies. The time has come for a return to the constructive methods of the Wilson administration.

CAUSES OF THE PRESENT DEPRESSION

The reasons for our present depression are not far to seek. The unconscionable revisions upward in the Republican Fordney-McCumber tariff bill and the still higher rates of the Hawley-Smoot bill are responsible. These unconscionable rates provoked the retaliatory tariffs of foreign nations and international trade has stagnated. Our ships are rusting in our harbors.

The flight of American capital has commenced, and 2,200 branch factories, back of tariff walls of foreign countries, American branch plants, are operating with American capital and American superintendents; but they are employing 400,000 foreign laborers, and the flight of American capital has just commenced. The progress it is making is alarming. Mass production for foreign demand can no longer be carried on in our home factories. Retaliatory tariff walls can not be crossed. Conditions are growing worse.

The President recently vetoed our Democratic tariff bill, which provided for our participation in international economic conferences in order to reduce world tariff walls and make it possible to restore world prosperity, and especially the prosperity of American factories and American farmers. The President's answer and the answer of his advisers to the tariff conditions which have wrecked us and which have almost wrecked the world is "higher tariffs."

On account of our high tariffs the crash of 1929 came and in one week of time stock depreciated in value $80,000,000,000 on the New York Stock Exchange alone. They have decreased more than that since that time. The stock-market debacle of 1929, which still continues, carried this country down and we carried with us the rest of the world.

"A CHICKEN FOR EVERY POT"

In every newspaper throughout the land in the campaign of four years ago a full-page advertisement was carried with the heading "A Chicken for Every Pot." May I quote just a part of it?—

The Republican Party isn't a poor man's party. Republican prosperity has erased that degrading phrase from our political vocabulary. * * * Republican prosperity is written on fuller wage envelopes, written in factory chimney smoke. * * * Republican prosperity has reduced hours and increased earning capacity, silenced discontent, put the proverbial "chicken in every pot, and a car in every back yard to boot." * * * Republican administration has restored to railroads solvency, efficiency, and par securities. * * * The Republican Party rests its case on a record of stewardship and performance. * * * Wages, dividends, progress, and prosperity say "Vote for Hoover."

I could read more from this extravagant, optimistic campaign statement, and all to the same effect. In view of what has happened—and I have called attention to some of it in this speech—I submit these quotations without comment on my part.

WORLD TARIFFS AND DEPRESSION

For a long time—in fact, ever since the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922—I have been calling attention to the disastrous effect upon us and all the other nations of our high tariff leadership. I have been for a long time "a voice crying in the wilderness." I now can refer to recent statements of the highest authority which indicate that high tariffs are the cause of the present world depression, and until they are lowered there can be no return of prosperity.

The finance committee of the League of Nations in April of this year issued a report, now available, expressing its profound alarm over the condition into which the world is drifting. It called attention to the destructive effects of tariffs, quotas, and other trade restrictions, and declared that—

Unless the creditor States accept the goods in which the major part of the debts can alone be paid, the tendency is simply to still more rigorous methods of control and trade obstruction.

And it proceeds to say that—

This will lead inevitably to further fall of prices and the progressive strangulation of commerce. Not until these fundamental causes of the depression are dealt with can the hoped-for improvement take place.

Again, in May of this year the Bank for International Settlements states in its annual report:

If the relative position of the international balances of payment is continuously to be upset by changes in tariff barriers, with profound effects on the equilibrium of the different countries; if the flow of capital from one nation to another is to be dammed up by obstacles which make the fulfillment of contractual obligations virtually impossible * * * it becomes more and more evident that durable monetary stability can not be expected to exist.

And recently there came the declaration by the gold delegation giving further warning that trade can not be expected to revive while tariff barriers exist. I quote from the statement in part:

If political conditions are such that nations hesitate to commit themselves to too great interdependence one upon the other, but impose these rigid restrictions upon international trade in their effort to attain economic self-sufficiency, there will be little scope for any international monetary mechanism. * * *

I could quote from more of the world's best authorities to the same effect, but I have quoted enough. The high tariffs of the Republican Party, thereby inducing the retaliatory high tariffs for foreign nations, are responsible in the greatest degree for the condition in which the world, including the United States, finds itself at the present time.

Notwithstanding all the facts to which I have above called attention; notwithstanding the absolute failure of Republican leadership, it is insisted at the opening of the present campaign that the remedy for all the ills that be is to continue in control the policies of the party which is responsible for the deplorable condition in which this country and the world finds itself to-day.

REDUCING THE COST OF GOVERNMENT AND BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, to-day, with the evidences of depression all about us, touching and paralyzing industry, creating uncertainty as to the ability of financial institutions, increasing tremendously the burdens and difficulties of our farmers, and bringing destitution and distress to unemployed workers, it is indeed difficult to believe that any good has or will come from the present depression. And yet, with all the losses and discouragements we have experienced as a people, I am confident that there has come to us a very distinct and worth-while gain, namely, an awakened and intelligent interest upon the part of our people in the cost of government, Federal, State, and local.

With increased interest there has come an insistent demand that the cost of government be reduced. It is regrettable that the propaganda sent throughout the country has in many instances confused our people and given a wrong impression as to the cost of the Federal Government. This is due to the fact that no distinction was made between Federal, State, and local governmental expenditures. Consequently, when reference has been made to "government expenses," the average individual considered this as meaning "Federal expenses." Therefore, much of the criticism directed to Congress as being responsible for the heavy burden of taxation now resting upon our people should in fact have been directed to State and local authorities.

Permit me to illustrate by referring to a very caustic letter received by me criticizing Congress as being responsible for keeping in office a vast horde of officeholders that represented one to every six or seven people. I realized that this was not true and that the writer was mistaken. However, I looked into the matter to ascertain the exact facts. I found that there are approximately 600,000 civil employees of our Government, or about 1 for every 200 of our population. This was a substantial difference from the statement contained in the letter and is characteristic of many more such statements that have been given wide circulation. The mistake was probably due to a failure to draw any distinctions and charge every officeholder, of every kind and character anywhere and everywhere in the entire country, to the Federal Government. Many more equally extravagant and untrue statements have come to my attention at various times. Of course, it is easy enough to correct these misstatements when addressed to me by letter or otherwise, but I often wonder as to how general such impressions are and no opportunity ever given to correct them.

Thus, because of such propaganda, there is not only a tendency to blame Congress for the burden of taxation but a demand that it provide relief therefrom. Those who criticize and make such demand of Congress overlook the fact that the burden of taxation that weighs so heavily is the result of State, county, and local taxes. The expenditures for which these agencies of government are responsible have increased by leaps and bounds since the World War. Former President Coolidge is quoted as having said that in 16 years the State and municipal expenses jumped from $2,227,000,000 to $9,116,000,000. And the increase in the bonded indebtedness of States and local municipalities has been even greater in proportion. In 1913 the total National, State, and local bonded indebtedness was $4,200,000,000. Of this amount $3,200,000,000 represented State and local bonded indebtedness. The latest figures place the bonded debt of State and local municipalities at $30,000,000,000. This means increased burdens to the local taxpayers; and it is the real-estate owner who bears most of that burden. In considering the cause and remedy for tax burdens we must not overlook the fact that State and local budgets combined account for three-fourths of all taxes collected or money spent for governmental purposes in America. The Federal Government is in no way responsible for this. It receives no part of the money raised by local taxation and is not chargeable with creating the burden.

While State, county, and local indebtedness have increased to fabulous amounts, during the last 12 years the Federal indebtedness has been decreased $9,000,000,000, with a consequent saving of more than $300,000,000 in interest each year. Thus, while local indebtedness has been steadily increasing the Federal indebtedness has decreased by more than one-third. But, notwithstanding the fact, the heavy taxes which our people are called upon to carry are the result of State, county, and local government expenditures over which Congress has no jurisdiction, and overlooking the further fact that only 3 per cent of our people contribute directly to the support of the Federal Government—not including excise and direct taxes recently imposed as a temporary or emergency tax—yet the demand is made that Congress relieve our people of the tax burden under which they are now struggling.

There is no congressional action that can be taken to relieve taxpayers from the burden incident to State and local taxes. It is not within the realm of congressional authority nor one over which it has any jurisdiction or power.

Relief from local tax burdens can only be accomplished when States and local municipalities are willing to cut expenditures in the same drastic manner as the Federal Government, by action of Congress, has already done. What finer example could be given than that shown by Congress in cutting the appropriations of the Federal Government for the coming year $857,353,618.94 below the appropriations of the past year? To this reduction is to be added a further saving of $150,000,000 resulting from the passage of the economy bill, making a total reduction of governmental expenses for the coming year of $1,007,353,618.94. This splendid result is a far greater saving than that suggested by the Bureau of the Budget submitted by the President to Congress in December last. Congress reduced the Budget estimate by $184,294,094.18, and when there is added to this the estimated saving of $150,000,000 by the economy measure, it shows a total saving of $334,294,094.18 effected by Congress beyond that suggested by the Bureau of the Budget, and more than a billion dollars less than the preceding year.

The problems incidental to properly balancing our National Budget have created differences of opinion as to the ways and means to be adopted. No one in public life has presented to the people of the Nation more clearly and forcefully the underlying principles that must govern in this important matter than David Lawrence, editor and owner of the United States Daily, published in Washington, D. C. He has performed a great public service in disseminating the information that has been contained in his weekly radio addresses. The following address, entitled "Analyzing the Federal Budget," delivered by him over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. system on April 24 last is particularly appropriate and worth while. He said:

We hear a great deal of loose talk nowadays about the high cost of government. In the first place, what do we mean by "government"? Shall we visit upon the Federal Government all the sins of the several States and the cities? Combined, all three units spend about thirteen and a half billion dollars a year, of which the Federal Government spends less than one-third. In the last decade the Federal Government has been paying off the public debt at the rate of about $9,000,000,000 and has been yielding surpluses. We heard nothing about the high cost of government until something happened to income. What we are facing to-day is the high shrinkage of income.

This, to be sure, brings us face to face with the necessity of balancing the Budget, for the shrinkage in income has been about 50 per cent. Instead of taking in four billions a year for the Federal Government, we have been collecting about two billions.

The Federal Government's Budget is being cut. Congress is struggling with the problem to-day and so is the Executive. Unfortunately the task is being made more difficult by the vast amount of pressure exerted, on the one hand, by those who insist the Budget can be cut sufficiently to avoid all increased taxes and those who insist it should not be cut so as to affect their particular projects or interests.

Now, let us see just what there is to the theory that the Government has suddenly become an extravagant and wasteful institution, and that all the Budget surgeons have to do is to eliminate the wasteful or extravagant or superfluous bureaus and it will bring about a balanced Budget without increased taxation or increased borrowing.

I have to-night reclassified the official estimates for the new Budget. I am not taking into account anything in the way of economies that have been projected in the last few weeks, for I shall try to explain those to you next Sunday night, but I am dealing now with the recommendations made to Congress last December which furnish a basic outline of what has to be done in order to balance the Budget.

Out of the $4,000,000 Budget the entire expense of all the departments, bureaus, commissions, independent establishments, Congress, and the legislative establishment amounted to about $504,000,000.

Just think of it! If we abolished the entire civil establishment of the Government we would save only a half billion dollars. How, then, can we say that by cutting out "useless bureaus" we can meet a deficit which for the year ending June 30 next amounts to two billions and a half dollars?

Now, just keep in mind this $504,000,000 and we shall build up the items showing how the rest of the Budget is spent, at least how the estimates for the year beginning next July were made up when submitted to the present Congress for further economies and cuts.

The next big item is the Army and Navy. It amounts to $659,000,000. Who says we should abolish our national defense? Is the world ready yet for complete disarmament? Do the violations of treaties in the Far East recently indicate we have reached the point where we can discard the Army and Navy? Well, you will say they should at least be efficiently administered. Let us grant that and concede there are some economies to be effected, but we certainly will not find we can dispense with the whole $659,000,000 for the Army and Navy.

Thus far, adding the $504,000,000 for the civil establishment and the $659,000,000 for the Army and Navy, we add up to $1,163,000,000.

We come next to the interest on your Liberty bonds and Government securities. We certainly can not repudiate these commitments. Our banks have them in their vaults. They are a part of the capital structure of the Nation. We can not revise that commitment or cut it in any way. The interest amounts to $640,000,000. Think of it—almost as much as the Army and Navy combined.

So adding once more, we have counted up to $1,803,000,000.

We come now to the cost of veterans. This amounts to $1,123,000,000 a year. I talked about this two weeks ago and shall only say in passing that, regardless of what we may think of the item, the Government has taken a commitment to its veterans which, if it decides to repudiate or revise, we might as well say frankly will be met with the opposition of veterans and their friends, and it would be next to impossible to get such repudiation through Congress. Indeed, we shall be lucky if this item is not increased. There are, of course, some economies in administration and certain inequities that can be straightened out; but the most that has been recommended thus far by anybody in a position of responsibility is a cut of only $8,000,000.

But again continuing with the estimates we find the items I have mentioned thus far, namely, $1,803,000,000, when combined with the veterans' item makes a total of $2,926,000,000.

We took in during the current fiscal year less than two billions in income, so if we merely want to meet the obligations I have just enumerated, we would have to borrow money or increase taxes so as to get more revenue.

Now, there are two more items left that I have not dealt with. One is an item of $363,000,000 for improvements. This includes public roads, public buildings, rivers and harbors, and general construction, all urged upon the Government as a means of diminishing the ill-effects of unemployment and helping the producers of raw materials and giving work to skilled as well as unskilled labor. Maybe we don't need all of that $363,000,000 this year for public works, but there, again, the question is whether the commitments and authorizations made in past years can or should be revised.

There is another item of $155,000,000, which is the cost of running the Post Office Department—that is the deficit. It is one of the reasons why there is now planned an increase in postage rates. But that's only another form of taxation, so whoever says we need not increase revenues by taxes or other revenue-raising measures payable by the public isn't again carefully examining our shrunken revenues.

All these items thus far count up to $3,444,000,000, and to this must be added $496,000,000 as the annual installment payment on the public debt. This item is not to be confused with the annual interest. It is known as sinking fund and is designed to diminish the principal every year.

So the total Budget thus adds up to close to about four billions.

Now, let us consider this Budget in another way. We hear much conversation about "less Government in business," much "Government competition with business," and so on.

Let me ask you, what competition with business there is as between the Army and Navy and the business world? Where does the Navy buy its supplies; where does it buy its materials? From private business.

Again what competition is there between the expenses of the Veterans' Bureau and the business world? Don't the veterans spend their money buying things from private business firms, stores, and individuals?

What competition is there between the money spent for interest and sinking fund on the public debt and the business world? The interest goes to the holders of securities—the American people.

What competition is there between the roads and buildings constructed and the business world which indeed profits from their construction? There are no Government contractors or laborers—for virtually all of these public works private builders are engaged.

What competition is there between the Post Office Department and the public? Would the Nation repeal the parcel post act or would it turn over the carrying of the mails to private contract, and could any private concern make money out of it if the Government insisted on regulation which it would of course do lest such a Government-granted monopoly would lead to excessive prices for postage and carrying of packages? And who carries the mails? Why the railroad and steamship companies and now the aviation companies—they receive a large part of the Government's money.

Now let us take all the independent commissions and boards—they cost exactly $53,000,000. If we abolished them all we wouldn't be able to balance the Budget because the $53,000,000 is a little more than 1 per cent of the whole Budget.

We hear much comment about the cost of the various departments. For instance, we look over the departmental appropriations and we discover that the agricultural department spends $197,000,000. We find this to be one of the largest items. But when we examine it what do we learn? Why, that $109,000,000 of the amount is for public roads. And who wants these roads? The automobile industry, which has urged them for a generation. And without those roads we could not have made the automobile as popular a piece of merchandise as it is to the American people. So actually the Agricultural Department spends about $88,000,000 net and not $197,000,000. And would you say $88,000,000 is an excessive amount to spend annually to care for the interests of the American farmer whose total output is on the average worth between nine and ten billion dollars a year and has gone as high as twelve billions? That represents a big purchasing power and we are all dependent on it and want agriculture sustained.

Let us look at the Treasury Department. Here we find in the list that the department cost $293,000,000. But out of this we must take $146,000,000 for public buildings. So the Treasury Department itself spends only $147,000,000, and out of that we find that we could logically subtract $33,000,000, which is the cost of collecting the billions in taxes and revenues, and $20,000,000 for gathering of customs duties. This would make the net cost of the Treasury, if we eliminate the cost of collecting taxes, in the neighborhood of ninety millions, and even this is hardly a fair reflection of what the Department of the Treasury does, for it has the Public Health Service and miscellaneous activities that have been under that department virtually from the beginning of the Republic.

My purpose is merely to show you that the Government departments as a whole, all of them, including the independent offices, do not cost us a half billion out of our four billion, and you can not abolish them all. Even if you cut them 50 per cent, you could save but $250,000,000, a big saving, to be sure, but it would not avoid the need for some new taxation.

But in all this discussion of waste I think we should bear in mind that there are certain offsets which are rarely counted. For instance, the average salary of the higher executives of the Government is about $12,000 a year. How many corporations in America doing a business of $100,000,000 a year pay their presidents only $12,000 a year? How many business men with the responsibility for spending $100,000,000 a year would be content to take a salary of $12,000? Why, we know they run from $50,000 to $100,000 a year, and there are many subexecutives, vice presidents, and so on, who get in excess of $12,000 a year in the larger corporations.

The Government of the United States gets the benefit of the services of its executives at low cost. These men who come here for reasons of patriotism and fidelity to the public interest are many of them able to get many times $12,000 a year in private business. The Government gets the benefits of their ability and talents. It mounts up to a saving of many millions of dollars a year, possibly offsetting to no small extent the inevitable waste or inefficiency that here and there creeps into governmental operation.

But when we come to cutting the Budget so as to avoid new taxes let us not be misled by taking up isolated items of waste and regarding them as characteristic of the whole governmental establishment. I have enumerated the items that involve commitments. They can not be repudiated. A private business may repudiate contracts, break contracts, repudiate commitments. The Government of the United States can not do that. It can not break faith. And that is one of the principal reasons why you can not tear down the Budget structure with a wave of the hand. It can be cut, it is being cut, but we can not cut it deeply enough to avoid increased taxes.

It is indeed gratifying as a Member of Congress to see such worth-while savings effected. To cut the appropriations for the fiscal year 1932–33, commencing July 1, 1932, $1,007,353,618.94 below the appropriations of last year, and $334,294,094.18 below the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget, is indeed an achievement in which pride may be taken. It is also an evidence of the sincerity with which Congress attacked this important part of the problem of bringing our national finances into balance and thereby maintaining our financial integrity and credit. The willingness of Congress to respond in this substantial manner to the demand of our people that the cost of government be reduced, can not help but bring satisfaction and encouragement.

BROKEN PROMISES

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the plight of agriculture is too serious for partisan attack. The facts themselves are a terrific indictment of the mistaken policies of the last 12 years.

In the convention of 1928 the Republican Party said in its platform:

> The Republican Party pledges itself to the development and enactment of measures which will place the agricultural interests of America on a basis of economic equality with other institutions to insure its prosperity and success.

Their candidate, Mr. Hoover, in his first campaign speech delivered at Palo Alto, Calif., on August 11, 1928, made this statement:

> The most urgent economic problem in our Nation to-day is in agriculture. It must be solved if we are to bring prosperity and contentment. * * * We pledge ourselves to find a solution.

On this platform Mr. Hoover was elected.

Were the declarations of the platform and the pledges of the candidate carried out? What are the facts?

According to a statement made by the Department of Agriculture on May 15, 1932, the price level of agricultural commodities is only 56 per cent of what it was during the 1910–1914 period, while the price level of commodities which the farmer must buy are 112 per cent of the same period. In other words, the relative price level of the farmer's money is 50 per cent on the dollar.

Did they bring prosperity to the farmer? Only a few days ago both cotton and wheat were at the lowest price they have reached in 100 years.

These things did not just happen. They are the result of the violation of inexorable economic laws.

Under the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover régime discriminations have been practiced against agriculture in tariffs, in freight rates, and in general policies, both of government and business enterprise. A wild spending orgy was indulged in, both public and private, encouraged under the slogan "the Coolidge and Hoover boom markets" until wreckage has been produced.

The organization of subsidiary corporations was encouraged, holding company was pyramided upon holding company with superorganizations, until the cost of administration reached the point where rates and prices for services were so high as to be prohibitive if returns were to be had on these overorganized institutions. The banks were permitted to sell foreign securities to the people, which turned out to be practically worthless. Much of the hard-earned American money was channeled into foreign lands. The picking seemed so good that these financiers were living in a fool's paradise.

The whole philosophy of this procedure has been wrong. The philosophy of the administration was to permit money to be concentrated and controlled by the privileged few, who in their avarice and greed have enjoyed favoritism in legislation enactment and policies to such an extent that agriculture has been bled white and its purchasing power has been largely destroyed.

This gradual bleeding of the agricultural sections and the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few has caused a paralysis to come upon the agricultural and livestock interests. This naturally tended to destroy the market for even the industrial products, and slow paralysis began to creep up on the rest of the economic body.

The only remedy that has been offered by the administration is to further favor the interests and financiers who have been in control and who have had a strangle hold on the throat of the Nation and who insist on keeping control. They have tried to relieve conditions by forcing relief in from the top, with the age-old, threadbare, and mistaken Republican notion that a little of such relief would trickle to the average American.

Recovery must begin at the grass roots. In the far-away stretches of this country, amid the tillers of the soil, a better price for farm commodities must be realized. If attention were given to this angle of the problem rather than continually trying to relieve the financiers, the country would have a chance to recover.

To the farmer I address the inquiry, "What are you going to do about it?" You have been deceived—you have been bunkoed.

There must be economy in government. Useless bureaus and commissions must be abolished. The prices of farm products must be restored and the farmer given a chance to pay his debts. This is the only way.

Never in the history of this country has there been such a need to apply the principles for which Jefferson wrought, Jackson fought, and for which the Democratic Party through the years has stood.

The effective remedy is to place control again in the hands of the party which has always stood for the rights of the average man, for the rights of every man, for equal opportunity to all.

After your experience will you again place the fate of this Nation in the hands of the group that has brought about the worst panic in modern civilization? Will you again trust the party that has established policies that have caused ruinously low prices, poverty, inability to pay debts, and finally, as a natural result, has caused even the smokestacks of the factories to rust in idleness because there is no market for their products?

Will you vote for the party that has given you the promise of prosperity and of a "chicken in every pot," but which in actuality has left nothing but wrecks by the way and given to the people only the cry of despair?

I do not believe you will.

IS CONGRESS TO BLAME?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in times such as these, when everybody and everything seems "out of joint," it is easy to criticize, find fault, and place the blame upon others than ourselves.

This is particularly true in the tendency to hold Congress responsible for all of our troubles and difficulties and look to it to solve all our problems and afford relief for all our losses, no matter what the cause thereof may have been.

Without regard to the origin, or giving any consideration to the fundamental causes responsible for the present depressed economic condition, there is a general demand that Congress should lift us out of the "slough of despond" and placed us on the high road to prosperity by the enactment of legislation. The answer is obvious to the thoughtful observer. The cause is not legislative but economic in character. It is world-wide in scope. It is not confined to our own country. Other nations have suffered even more severely than our own. If Congress, by the passage of unwise and uneconomic laws, had been responsible for bringing on the present depression, then it would be easy to remedy the situation and give relief by changing the law. However, as the cause is not legislative but economic in character and world-wide in effect, no remedy applied by Congress can prove a "cure-all."

There are some individuals, nevertheless, who seem to think that Congress holds in its hand a "magic wand," and that, by a mere waving thereof, all problems can be satisfactorily solved and an era of prosperity immediately returned to our people. Individuals such as these fall an easy prey to the seductive pleadings of the political demagogue, who claims that his party holds the "magic wand." To have such thoughts indicates a failure to consider or fully appreciate the fundamental causes of the depression. Thoughtful persons will realize that the ills of the world, by which we are affected, can not be cured by congressional enactments alone.

Furthermore, there must also be taken into consideration, in addition to the world economic condition that has had its distressing effect on our land, domestic conditions contributing to our distress that have likewise been neither legislative or, strictly speaking, even economic in character. I refer to the losses sustained by our people in having made investments which under the strain of adverse business conditions have proved unsafe and unsound. The collapse in the value of foreign and domestic securities, bringing a loss of billions of dollars to those who hold such securities, is neither attributable to nor the result of congressional action.

No one can properly hold Congress responsible for the unwise or unfair activity of our great financial interests that arranged and advised loans of great magnitude to foreign governments and private industry throughout the world, nor for the unfortunate willingness of our investors to follow the advice of such bankers.

It is now apparent that in some instances the financial interests or banking houses engaged in floating such foreign loans were so anxious to obtain the large and attractive commissions offered by the interested parties that they overlooked or closed their eyes entirely to the instability, insecurity, and often actual dishonesty of the foreign government or industry whose security was being offered. Thus, disgraceful though it may be, yet the facts frequently justify the accusation that these so-called "big bankers" were willing, for the individual gain that would be their reward, to recommend to an unsuspecting and confiding public the investment of funds in such securities. Investors were offered the experience, knowledge, and judgment of these financial leaders as a basis for belief in the safety and soundness of the securities and accepted their word. Certainly Congress is not chargeable with the tremendous losses suffered by the individuals and banks throughout the country who followed the unwise and improper advice of such "big bankers."

Nor did Congress instigate the wild orgy of speculation and inflation of securities and real estate that has been rampant throughout the Nation since the World War, resulting in a collapse of the stock market and bringing great distress to many of our people. Unfortunately many of those who suffered loss were humble people, unskilled in financial affairs, and possessing little, if any, knowledge of the precarious and shifting sands of Wall Street, but lured on by an apparent opportunity to gain new wealth quickly and easily.

Nor did Congress advise, pass upon, or grant the extension of credits or loans upon insufficient or improper security or make investments in weak or worthless stocks and bonds, foreign and domestic, which have caused so many banks to close their doors. The resultant losses to stockholders and depositors because of mistaken or poor judgment in these matters by those managing the affairs of such institutions are not in any sense chargeable to Congress; and yet it is expected by some that even this is in some way subject to a legislative remedy.

Another source of loss that has added greatly to the general distress, and likewise in the origin of which there is no responsibility to be placed upon Congress, is that which has been caused by an overexpansion of our industries.

During the World War, and immediately thereafter, the industrial leaders of our country, with the help of financial interests, entered upon extensive programs of business expansion. Additional buildings were constructed by old and new enterprises at high war-level costs, and the latest labor-saving machinery, designed to produce great quantities of manufactured goods quickly and cheaply was installed. Industry advanced by leaps and bounds. The forests, the fields, the mines, and all our natural resources were coordinated with our massive industrial machine, and this increased the productive power of our Nation to limits undreamed of a few years before. Stocks and bonds to finance and make possible this great era of production were issued in fabulous amounts. Industrial leaders inspired the manufacturers of less degree. Financial leaders exerted similar influence upon the conservative local bankers. The final result being that everyone, big and little, became imbued with the fascinating idea that vast production on a great scale was good business, that expansion was necessary, and that the conditions appearing to require such were natural and permanent in character.

Unfortunately, however, the industrial and financial "wizards" who encouraged the expansion of our industries and issued innumerable securities in a variety of forms, to provide the necessary funds, failed to realize that the world-wide demand for American products was due to the fact that workers of Europe were in the trenches engaged in warfare, and with the close of the war would return to their work-benches, and the demand for American goods would cease in proportion as each nation gradually returned to a peace-time basis and thereby become able to supply its own national demands.

The failure to give recognition to the economic conditions that would inevitably follow the World War, particularly from overexpansion of industry and extensive credit obligations unable of fulfillment under changed conditions, and many other contributing causes, could not help but eventually bring about a condition where "we must reap what we have sown."

Every nation of the world is to-day reaping the result of its follies—economic, financial, and otherwise. The war-torn nations of Europe are learning now in the severe school of experience that the effect of war can not be limited to the actual time of combat nor measured alone by the number of dead and wounded, but that there are inexorable economic laws that will not be denied and will demand and receive their toll. Unfortunately, it is all too apparent. Our own Nation is not immune from the effects of European folly, and consequently our Nation and its people are experiencing a large measure of distress that finds its cause elsewhere. To-day, as we are conscious of the fact that "no man liveth unto himself," we are learning by experience that "no nation liveth unto itself," and that America can not escape the workings of economic laws affecting other nations. This truth again makes plain the fact that as Congress did not originate, neither can it, standing alone, remove the cause or supply the remedy.

The different causes already touched upon as having a bearing upon the question of responsibility for our present condition of distress are mentioned, not with any thought that they make a complete list, but merely to illustrate how easy it has been to charge responsibility to Congress not only for the existence but also for the failure to remove the cause, when, as a matter of fact, both the cause and the remedy are totally outside the sphere of congressional action.

Frequently the very "interests" that have been most responsible for the present condition have been the most ready, by unfair and untrue propaganda, to create a feeling of resentment upon the part of our people toward their Government and their representatives. It has, indeed, often seemed that such "interests" in conduct and practice resemble very closely the thief who, after robbing the jewelry store, ran down the street crying aloud, at the top of his voice, "Stop thief! Stop thief!" He was seeking by his cry to divert suspicion from himself. This same logic to-day impels some who are in a measure responsible for present conditions to divert suspicion from themselves.

The need to-day is for the man who honestly, courageously, and without thought of political advantage seeks, by constructive thought and action, to relieve present conditions, and who is not satisfied to spend his energy in useless criticism.

Even though it is true that Congress is not responsible for the cause, nor has in its hands the power to provide a complete remedy, yet there is a duty upon it not only to recognize the need but by appropriate legislation to provide the means to utilize the financial resources of the Nation to combat the disastrous effect of present conditions, and thereby save ourselves in the largest measure possible from the hardships and distress incident to the period of readjustment. Until Congress, as the law-making body of the Nation, has done this thing, it has not done its full duty to our people.

Congress has endeavored to fulfill that duty. The laws already enacted, some but recently, it is hoped will prove beneficial to every class within our borders. Congress has recognized the necessity of maintaining our financial structure, of providing credit that large employers of labor might continue in industry, and other activities related thereto, and that farmers might likewise be helped, of making available funds for home owners to prevent foreclosures, of inaugurating a vast program of public construction of every kind and character, Federal, State, and local, and to assist State and local municipalities not only in providing work itself but more direct relief to the destitute and needy who are unable to procure work. In addition thereto, Congress has reduced the cost of government for Federal activities by $800,000,000 below the appropriations of last year; it has also passed an economy measure that will effect further savings of approximately $150,000,000. This is but a general summary of the numerous acts of Congress passed in an effort to relieve distress, provide employment, and decrease the cost of government.

There has been an honest and sincere effort upon the part of Congress to fulfill its responsibility to the people. While at times there may have been some differences of policy along party lines, yet, generally speaking, there has been an absence of cheap political partisanship. This spirit of cooperation must continue in the days to come, if anything worth while is to be accomplished for the good of our country in this hour of emergency.

THE SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—ITS FAILURES AND ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, as we come to the closing hours of the first session of the Seventy-second Congress our thoughts naturally turn to the achievements as well as the failures or shortcomings of the session now about to pass into history.

Inasmuch as the House of Representatives was organized last December by the Democrats, elected a Democrat as Speaker, and has maintained a Democratic majority of from two to six throughout the session, I suppose that I shall be expected by some of our Democratic leaders to announce from the housetops that this has been the most progressive and outstanding of any session since the Democrats controlled both Houses of Congress back in the year of 1920. I wish that I might be able to truthfully make such a declaration. I wish I might be able to point with pride to an outstanding record by this Congress for economy and progressive legislation. Honesty and candor forces me to say, however, that the present Congress has been "outstanding" in at least two particulars. First, it has followed the dictates of the White House almost blindly in passing special legislation for big business; and second, it has ignored, failed, and refused to give any measure of relief to the broke and tax-burdened farmers of the country.

OPPOSED MORATORIUM

It will be recalled that during the summer of 1931, while Congress was not in session, President Hoover made his famous surrender to the international bankers and pledged this country, without any authority, to a moratorium of one year on certain foreign war debts. When this session reconvened last December Members of Congress were called on by the big newspapers of the country, as well as the big politicians of their districts, to stand by the President. I am glad I did not make any rash promises. I am glad I refused to vote for the moratorium, in the face of the fact that I had received many letters from constituents urging me to support it and assuring me that this "master stroke" of the White House would accomplish wondrous things in relieving the depression and bring back business prosperity. Not only that, but I also made a speech on the floor of the House vigorously opposing a moratorium on foreign war debts. I predicted then that the so-called moratorium would be an opening to final cancellation. I insisted then that it was not a 1-year holiday that Europe really wanted or would receive if and when the moratorium bill was passed.

MUST NOT CANCEL WAR DEBTS

In opposing the President's moratorium, as shown by the RECORD, I stated on the floor of this House:

I can not in good conscience support the moratorium, because I am fully convinced that it is not a one year's postponement we are voting on here to-day, but full and absolute cancellation. Be not deceived; you are simply lifting these debts from the shoulders of Europe and transferring them to the already weary backs of our American taxpayers of to-day as well as those of generations yet to come.

Again, in a speech on this floor later, discussing the same subject, I said:

Had the White House demanded that the international bankers also declare a moratorium on their private loans to Europe, there might have been some justification for his course, but no such demands were made. The gold that had been shipped to America by Europe and that would have aided much to replenish a depleted Treasury never left Wall Street. It was not shipped back to Europe but remained in the vaults of the international bankers.

WOULD FORESTALL ANOTHER MORATORIUM

In order to forestall another moratorium by the White House I introduced in the House Concurrent Resolution No. 33, which not only expressly declared it to be against the policy of the United States to enter into any agreement with any foreign country indebted to our Government for the postponement of payments on indebtedness due the United States, but declares that—

Congress will not at any time give favorable consideration to any agreement or proposal for any such postponement or payments of indebtedness entered into or proposed by any officer or agent of the United States.

COULD NOT SUPPORT RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, another pet measure of the administration at Washington, came up for consideration I not only voted against it but repeatedly spoke against it, both before the committees and on the floor of the House. Time and again I have reminded Members of this House that, in my judgment, the bill was conceived in Wall Street, prepared by Wall Street, and rushed through Congress for Wall Street. Among other things I said:

This bill is nothing more or less than a dole to big business. It comes here for the purpose of making good worthless and questionable securities of big international bankers, large trunk-line railroads, and other political favorites. In the face of the fact that we are confronted with the largest deficit in the past quarter of a century, big business proposes to further drain a depleted Federal Treasury. Then hardly will the ink be dried, if and when the President signs the bill, until you same gentlemen will be back here trying to force a general sales tax or a special nuisance tax on the backs of the farmers and small taxpayers of the country. I can not support such a program.

Mr. Speaker, my prediction came true. We witnessed the sorry spectacle of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation lending money like drunken sailors to defunct railroads whose bonds were worth 10 to 12 cents on the dollar. We saw the chairman of that organization arrange for a loan for "only" $80,000,000 to his own bank, then resign on the pretext that "business was on the upgrade." A few days later the "loan" was announced. Is it any wonder that our people have lost faith in "the powers that be" at Washington?

OPPOSED GENERAL SALES TAX

Again, as I predicted, the same leaders who sponsored this and other doles to the international bankers and bondholders, as well as some of the large newspapers, started a nation-wide campaign to force through Congress a general sales tax in order, they said, to balance the Budget. For several weeks the Federal Budget was the subject of the leading editorials of the newspapers owned and controlled by special interests. Not a word was said by any of them in defense of the unbalanced Budget at a time when it was being ransacked by and for big business. They evidently never thought of the Budget until they decided to put over a general sales tax, increase postage rates, and pass other objectionable and unreasonable nuisance taxes, all of which I am glad to say I opposed, but which were made necessary because the Treasury had been so ransacked by big business.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to no one in a desire to keep the Government on an even keel and incidentally to keep the Federal Budget balanced; but I submit that it is a poor way to balance the Budget, or keep it balanced, by fostering a general sales tax on the very necessities of life, and thus pile additional burdens on the backs of the farmers and small business men of the country.

A SCHEME TO HEAP BURDENS ON POOR

When the sales tax was presented to Congress, I was one of the first Members of this body to rebel against that proposed legislation. In that memorable battle, the RECORD shows I began as follows:

Let me say in the outset that I can not in good conscience support this bill that would place a general sales tax on practically all the necessities consumed by the people with only a few exceptions, even though Judge CRISP, ex-Chairman HAWLEY, and other distinguished members of the committee choose to call it a manufacturers' tax. Whatever you may wish to call it, I insist that it is folly to say that this tax will not be handed down to the ultimate consumer. Remember, too, that it adds burdens to the people to the tune of more than $600,000,000, and yet that class owning about 90 per cent of the property of this country, the rich people of America, are only called upon to pay approximately $112,000,000 on increased incomes. I ask you in all sincerity, if such a proposal is honest, fair, or equitable?

MUST SLASH EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT

After answering many questions from proponents of the bill during the course of the debate, I closed the same speech by stating briefly my ideas about what Congress could and should do in the matter of retrenchment, as well as stating how additional revenues should be secured.

My distinguished and able friend from Georgia, who spoke so eloquently of the inarticulate voice of the people, and yet, who I fear, did not listen to that voice when he brought this bill here, repeatedly asked the question to-day, "If you do not adopt the sales tax, then what are you going to do about it?" That is a fair question, and I propose in the minute or so that is left, to answer it briefly, but I trust in a straightforward manner.

First, I would cut expenses of this Government to the bone before calling on the people for additional taxes. I would abolish countless commissions and overlapping and useless boards and bureaus. I do not hesitate to say that I would cut and slash Federal salaries, especially in the higher brackets. I am not one of those who think that Members of Congress are paid too much; but, personally, I would gladly accept a 10 per cent, yes, a 20 per cent salary cut or more, rather than vote for this outrageous, unfair, undemocratic, unscientific, and indefensible sales tax measure.

WOULD TAX WALL STREET GAMBLERS

Not only did I urge the slashing of governmental expenses, the lopping off of useless departments, and reducing Federal salaries but I have made several suggestions on ways and means to help balance the Federal Budget. In a speech on the floor early in this session I said:

Aside from increasing the surtax, corporation tax, and income tax, I would reenact the excess-profits tax that brought in over $300,000,000 in 1921, but that is left out of this bill.

Again, during the consideration of the revenue bill, I addressed the House urging that sales of Wall Street stock gamblers be taxed at least 1 per cent of the amount of the sales.

These Wall Street gamblers do not confine themselves to intangible stocks, mythical securities, and bogus memorandums, but they gamble to the tune of billions of dollars on commodities they never see, but which are produced by the sweat of the brows of millions of honest, hard-working farmers of America. Instead of prices of farm commodities being based on the law of supply and demand, they are too often controlled by and held at the mercy of Wall Street stock gamblers. [Applause.]

TAX ON STOCK SALES $100,000,000 PER YEAR

The House made a forward step by taxing sales of Wall Street stock exchanges not 1 per cent, as some of us demanded, but it did include in the revenue bill a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent. This tax, though seemingly insignificant, would bring to a depleted Federal Treasury no less than $100,000,000 per year. That was a step in the right direction.

When the revenue bill went to the Senate the millionaire Secretary of the Treasury, who now spends much of his time scolding the Democratic leadership of this House, rushed over to the Senate after a conference at the White House and demanded that the tax placed on Wall Street stock gamblers by the House of Representatives be eliminated, which was done. Not only did Secretary Mills demand that Congress back up on its determination to tax stock gamblers but he also insisted that income taxes be materially reduced, especially on incomes of millionaires in the higher brackets, and I am ashamed and chagrined to say that the Upper House heeded the demands of the Wall Street spokesman and lowered the income tax considerably from the figures placed in the bill by this House.

FARMERS NEED BUDGETS BALANCED

Inasmuch as so much has been said about balancing the Budget, let me state that I have cooperated in every reasonable way to that end; but I have insisted over and over again, and I repeat as we are now about to depart for our homes, that when the farmers of America get their budgets balanced we shall not have to worry about balancing the Federal Treasury. This Congress coming to a close to-day has dismally failed so far as any farm legislation is concerned. The tax-burdened farmer has been ignored.

EXPAND THE CURRENCY—RAISE COMMODITY PRICES

In my judgment, what the country needs most is lower money and higher commodity prices. There have been several bills to expand the currency introduced in this Congress, among which was one that passed overwhelmingly in the House, known as the Goldsborough bill, which might have given a measure of relief, but Wall Street said it was not "safe," and it was finally defeated in the Senate. The only possible chance for this Congress to pass a bill to expand the currency is to pass the Glass bill that will come before us for final passage to-night. It is that or nothing. Inasmuch as Senator GLASS is one of the country's foremost authorities on questions of finance, I am going to resolve all doubt in favor of this bill, and hope that it will have the effect of raising commodity prices and thus relieving the tense financial situation, a thing the President's entire program has failed to do.

SENATOR NORRIS PLACES RESPONSIBILITY

There have been a number of progressive farm bills introduced seeking to guarantee the cost of production to the farmer, but the Morgan-Mills-Mellon crowd has denounced them all as "unsafe" or unsound. I listened with unusual interest a while ago to a speech made in the Senate by the veteran statesman from Nebraska, the progressive Republican Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, who gave some cold facts on the farm legislation. He said, in part:

I get just a little bit tired of men and papers continually saying, "What has Congress done for the farmer?" It has been defeated by the White House in every great farm measure we have tried to enact, or through White House influence.

We might just as well face the fact that we can not get any legislation unless we can muster two-thirds in the House and in the Senate, as long as Herbert Hoover is in the White House. We all know that to be true. I am not telling Senators anything they do not all know.

When he ran for President one of the propositions he laid before the American people was that if he were elected he would do something for agriculture, that he would place the farmer on an equality with the manufacturer, that he would give the farmer the benefit of the tariff. Millions of people believed he would and that he could. He was "the miracle man" then. They took him at his word, and by an overwhelming majority he was elected.

He undertook to redeem that promise, and the result was the present act providing for the Federal Farm Board. That is his baby; that is his redemption of a preelection promise. That is the bill that was going to place the farmer on an equality with the manufacturer.

Through his influence, also, in redemption of another promise we passed a tariff act that was going to put the farmer on a basis of equality with others under the protective tariff. The Farm Board bill was passed and the tariff bill was passed, and those were the President's two promises to agriculture, and I think everybody here knows the result.

In a speech on the floor in support of my House Joint Resolution 273 last February I said:

The dire need for clothing and food is rampant in our beloved and once prosperous land. This deplorable condition is not confined to any one section of the country. Conditions are probably worse in the congested city districts than among the rural population; yet the prevailing price of farm products being far below the cost of production, millions of honest, patriotic, and hard-working tillers of the soil have been thrown into bankruptcy. Thousands of Oklahoma farmers have seen their life savings swept from under them within the past two or three years. Farms are being foreclosed daily, and thousands of tenant farmers are in as much destitution as those who live in the towns and cities. I feel that it is inexcusable for this Government to hold millions of dollars' worth of clothing that the War Department admits can not possibly be used, with citizens of this country on the verge of freezing for the lack of sufficient clothing and with dire need widespread all over the land. If that be a dole, then make the most of it.

APPROPRIATIONS REDUCED

Inasmuch as I have freely criticized many acts of Congress, it is only fair to say that it has reduced the appropriations for expenses of operating the departments of the Federal Government more than $700,000,000 below what it took for the same departments to function under two years ago. For example, this Congress has reduced the appropriations for the War Department alone more than $60,000,000. This is $24,000,000 below what the President's army of experts, known as the Bureau of the Budget, told Congress it was possible for the War Department to operate on. Every department of Government has been cut from 10 to 20 per cent. This has been done over the vigorous protests of heads of every department and over the protests of several members of the President's Cabinet.

When the House was straining every effort to pass the economy bill making these reductions one of the President's several secretaries motored from the White House to the Capitol in one of the nine new Lincolns, or other high-powered cars recently purchased by the White House, to advise Congress not to make these reductions. This secretary, being a former Member of Congress, was permitted to go on the floor of the House, buttonhole Members, and urge the defeat of the House economy bill and was instrumental in eliminating one section of same that was estimated to save $100,000,000 per year.

UNABLE TO FOLLOW PRESIDENT

This Congress has passed a few progressive measures. Aside from the Goldsborough currency measure passed by the House but killed in the Senate, it passed the nonpartisan tariff bill, the latter of which was promptly vetoed by the President. The proviso in the revenue bill placing a small tax of 1 cent per gallon on imported crude oil was progressive and needed legislation. That tax, in my judgment, should have been not less than 2 cents per gallon, and I trust the tax will be doubled by the next Congress. I am glad to say that the entire Oklahoma delegation not only enthusiastically supported a tax on imported crude oil but waged a united fight that resulted in that provision remaining in the revenue bill.

I have been criticized by some of my extremely partisan Republican friends because I have not been able to follow the President. In one of the first speeches I made in this House during the present session I stated I would be glad to follow the President when I believed him to be right, but I would not hesitate to oppose him when I felt in my heart that he was wrong. Inasmuch as the President's program has been the program of big business, the international bankers, great trunk railroads, and huge banking institutions, none of which have anything in common with the people I am trying to represent in Oklahoma, I have been absolutely unable to follow such a program.

Below are excerpts from some other speeches made by me on the floor of this House giving my views briefly on important matters of legislation.

WAR, PEACE, AND PREPAREDNESS

Now, I desire to say a word about war, peace, and preparedness. Our war veterans and veterans' organizations, like the American Legion and auxiliary, are repeatedly charged by their enemies with being militarists. That charge is unfair and unfounded. Men who have faced machine guns, who have suffered the privations and hardships of war, who have stood in the muddy, filthy, cootie-infested trenches of Flanders Field, Chateau-Thierry, and the Argonne Forest, do not desire another war. They abhor the thought of another armed conflict. The sad memories of the last one to thousands are not only a terrible nightmare but a grim reality. They think of war as heartless military murder. They know, too, that war is utterly useless and seldom settles anything. Mothers, wives, and sisters of our war veterans are more bitter against war. Millions of innocent and helpless children cry out against war. Our veterans and veterans' organizations, however, if I know their sentiments generally, feel that one of the surest ways of maintaining peace in America is for us to be reasonably well prepared against war. It is folly to say that for the United States to disarm or materially reduce our Army, Navy, and aircraft, while all Europe arms to the belt, would be any insurance against future wars. To disarm under such conditions would be national suicide.

MUST MAKE WAR PROFITEERING IMPOSSIBLE

For several weeks the black clouds of war have been hanging low over the Far East; the jingoists, professional militarists, and war profiteers are already beginning to demand war against a powerful Government on the other side of the globe. It is high time for Congress to make it plain that before this Government shall ever call on the young men of this Nation to serve in armed forces against a foreign foe that all wealth and materials necessary to conduct a war without profit to anyone shall be placed under military rule. I submit that the resources and wealth of this land are not as dear as the most humble human life. Some of us have been advocating such a law for many years and are convinced that if Congress will take a firm and definite action on this part of the American Legion program, which, by the way, has also the indorsement of every farm organization in America, that it will mean infinitely more to the safety and security of our people than great armies, modern machine guns, death-dealing gases, huge cannon balls, or thirty to forty million dollar battleships.

PEACE CONFERENCES FAIL

If this Congress could be induced to adopt a program that would make future war profits impossible, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a mighty forward step in the great cause for world-wide peace. It would be more practical and much less expensive than to send a delegation from America to a so-called peace conference in Europe, who will spend some three or four hundred thousand dollars in wining and dining bewhiskered foreigners, none of whom are our friends, but many of whom are eager to get the United States embroiled in the ever-present and the constantly increasing troubles of the Old World. I expressed this same thought some four years ago in addressing the House, when, as I recall, another alleged peace conference was scheduled to be held in Geneva, Switzerland. At that time I closed my remarks as follows:

> If peace is to be maintained in this great land of ours, we must take the profits out of war. We must eliminate the blighting effects of the damnable profiteers who have amassed great fortunes out of war. We must make it plain to our people and the world that property is no more sacred to America than human lives. We must conscript every available resource in this country in case of armed conflict. That will do far more, Mr. Speaker, toward perpetuating the peace of the world than all the peace conferences held in the past decade. Let us eliminate the profits of war, and then, when the other nations follow our example, peace will breathe as fragrantly in the world almost as if the day of redemption had come.

Having myself attended two peace conferences in Europe as one of the representatives of this body since becoming a Member of Congress, I desire to state that I share the same views to-day as I did when I addressed the House on this subject in 1928.

GIVE FARM BOARD WHEAT TO HUNGRY

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, this bill proposing to turn over to the Red Cross for distribution to the destitute people of America 40,000,000 bushels of wheat now being held in storage by the Federal Farm Board is one that should not, in my opinion, have opposition from any Member on either side of this aisle. The fact is, this bill should have been passed the first week of the present session, and the destitute and hungry people of the land could have been fed by this surplus wheat all winter rather than wait until spring.

I have stated on the floor of this House more than once that I would much prefer to support legislation to provide work for the unemployed and destitute citizens in order that they might be able to feed and clothe themselves, and I still feel that way about it; but this Congress is faced with a terrible and frightful condition of starving and hungry people, and not a mere fanciful theory.

There are some eight or ten millions of American citizens without work; and the army of unemployed, instead of diminishing, has grown every week and month for the past two years and more. A hungry person will not long remain a patriotic citizen. If leaders of Congress will spend less time denouncing the so-called reds and hunger marchers and pass legislation like this to feed their hungry stomachs, that vast army of hungry and discontented will diminish rather than grow with every passing day. [Applause.]

I must confess I do not understand why Members of Congress will quibble over this proposal to distribute this surplus grain to the starving and needy of our own people, especially after you have been so magnanimous to foreign countries. You did not raise any objections when Congress made a direct appropriation to feed the starving in China a few years ago, nor did we hear the cry of "dole" when this Government spent some $20,000,000 to feed the hungry and starving of Russia. Some of you whose statesmanship will not permit you to support this legislation raised no objection when Congress doled out an appropriation to feed the hungry people of Germany not many years ago.

It has only been a few years since the gentleman who occupies the White House and who now warns Congress against making any direct appropriation for relief for the starving people of America did ask Congress for a dole of $100,000,000 to the starving children of Belgium, and the appropriation was made without opposition or question on either side of this aisle. But I submit in all fairness, Mr. Chairman, that the starving women and children and the destitute people of our own beloved America are entitled to as much consideration as are those of Belgium, Russia, China, or other ungrateful nations beyond the seas.

Inasmuch as that word "dole" seems to be about the only obstacle in the way of some to support this bill, I can not resist the temptation to remind Members of this House once more that this Congress gave a dole to foreign governments, big railroad lines, and international bankers. But let us be candid about the matter—just what has this Congress done thus far to relieve the distressed farmer or the unemployed and destitute of the land? If it is statesmanship to give big business a dole, I insist that it is no crime to feed the hungry.

EMERGENCY FEDERAL ROAD FUND

Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the opposition that has developed to this bill to create an emergency fund of $120,000,000 to construct highways throughout the length and breadth of the land, with some twelve millions additional for road construction in our public parks and Indian reservations.

I can not say that I am especially surprised at the strenuous opposition of the distinguished Republican leader from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. But I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at the vociferous opposition of the distinguished gentleman from Chicago [Mr. CHINDBLOM], who is not particularly known as such a consistent advocate of economy. In fact, it has only been a few days ago that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois stood on this floor and begged Congress to appropriate $1,750,000 to finance a show that his friends and constituents are sponsoring in the great city of Chicago; a show that he, several months ago, induced Congress to recognize as the world's fair. As I recall, we were assured by the same gentleman that Congress would not be called upon to make an appropriation for his fair; but the camel got its neck under a tent and Congress has been called upon to pay a lion's share of the bill. Only a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who now pleads with tears in his eyes for economy, was begging Congress to appropriate some million and three-quarters, and actually induced this House to give his fair $1,000,000. Now, the gentleman from the great city, along with other distinguished leaders from some of the other city districts, are vigorously opposing this bill for highway construction that means so much toward the relief of the unemployed throughout the entire country. I do not understand that brand of economy.

The pending road bill should by all means be passed to-day.

WOULD PAY BONUS IN CASH

Permit me to say again, as I have previously stated upon this floor, that I favor payment of the so-called bonus certificates in cash. This is a debt due the veterans by the Government. It is not only a just debt but an acknowledged obligation on the part of the Government to the veterans and should be paid now. I have had considerable to say in the past in criticism of war profiteers and shall discuss that again in a moment. First, however, we ought to at least partially pay those men who actually fought the last one. Let us in this manner take some of the profits out of the last war.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION INDEPENDENCE DAY ADDRESS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by me as a part of the nation-wide program of the American Farm Bureau Federation:

My fellow Americans, and especially those Americans who form the great body of agricultural producers, I want to express my deep appreciation for the opportunity given me, through the courtesy of the American Farm Bureau Federation, to join with you to-day in solemn reconsecration to the welfare of our beloved land.

In spirit I am sitting among you in the thousands of meeting places in which the farmers of America and their precious families are gathered at this hour. In spirit I bring you my humble message of greeting and good cheer, and with us is that great spirit, the spirit of the man whom Americans in loving remembrance will always refer to as the Father of Our Country. And that great spirit of our greatest man belongs especially to you. For he was a farmer—the best farmer of his time. It was as a farmer that he found the few years of peace and tranquillity in a life otherwise crowded with grave national concerns.

I like to give rein to my imagination and visualize George Washington as the farmer of Mount Vernon beside the lovely Potomac. There, amid the calm and quiet surroundings of his homestead, he exemplified the finest qualities of the American farmer. He knew every field, every tree, every animal.

He was not content to follow the agricultural traditions of his time. Always he sought improvement. Always he experimented with crops and soils. Always he sought to raise the standards of his stock. Always he conducted correspondence with farm authorities at home and abroad. And always was his enthusiasm aroused at the sight of good-growing crops, neat fences, well-cared-for trees and shrubs and spreading meadows.

When the sun in the glamorous beauty of a Virginia morning rose over the broad waters of the Potomac, his day began. With the first flashing glory of dawn he was astir, and with him came the awakening of all about him. His was the planning mind and the directing hand. Nothing was so small as to escape his keen eye. While demanding industry of those about him, he was not a hard taskmaster. To those who grew old or otherwise incapacitated in his service he was an indulgent master and provider. Not only did he care for his own family and other dependents but he never turned a deserving man or woman from his door. His charities were unobtrusive but generous. His private life exemplified the religious principles that influenced his great career.

When the shadows lengthened and the quiet hour of relaxation came, George Washington sat with his family and friends and watched the play of fading light upon the quiet river. What must it have been to be numbered among that intimate company! What an experience to feel his presence and hear his voice!

George Washington was not all drama and heroics. He was the ideal host, the generous companion, the friendly and sympathetic neighbor.

And, after all, is there anything greater than the friendship and sympathy of a neighbor? Those who dwell in cities have lost almost entirely that finest element of human relationship. But it still survives, and, thank God, must ever survive in the rural neighborhoods and communities of our great Nation.

You who are gathered together to-day represent that neighborhood spirit, that kindness and sympathetic consideration which comes from dwelling close to nature and in the employment of common interests, the serving of common ends, and the enjoyment of common labor.

This feeling that I have for rural life is genuine, deep, and abiding. You neighboring farmers have a possession far more precious than riches, position, or power. It is the expanding of life, the development of elemental human traits in men and women. It makes for sincere and lasting friendship, and those who are privileged to enjoy neighborhood relationships get something from life which must be prized above all other human gifts.

George Washington was the ideal neighbor. I prefer to think of him in that character, although, of course, his transcendent personality, his great deeds of leadership in war and in peace, his service to his country, which led him far from home, are the things perhaps best remembered about him.

When the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was organized, and I was honored by being made its associate director, we had a corps of historians who turned the keen light of research upon every act and every phase of character of this great man.

We have endeavored, with the best authoritative assistance, to rescue the life of George Washington from tradition, from myth, from error, and from persistent falsehood. We want to preserve to the Americans yet to come a truthful account of the life, the character, and the services of George Washington.

In all this mass of material, that which has appealed to me most have been the simpler things, the humbler things in connection with George Washington's personal and private life.

While I stand in awe of George Washington as the military hero, while I bow in humble tribute to his colossal acts of statesmanship, I yet feel closer to the man when in reverie I sit upon the great porch at Mount Vernon on a quiet afternoon and think of him there as the farmer, the husbandman, the neighbor.

How he would delight to be among the farmers of his beloved country to-day. How his great soul would expand with pleasure to feel the warmth of your love and veneration. And what courage, what strength, and what confidence his presence would bring to you in these hours that are clouded with anxieties and confused with difficulties.

George Washington has left us immortal legacies. He has pointed the way for our national security and prosperity. Upon the foundations which he laid our Government has expanded until it is one of the greatest powers of the earth. Yet over and above all is the human George Washington, the neighbor, and the man.

The same sun which rises in its glory above the home of George Washington rises upon you and me. The same winds which sang their pæans of peace over the flowers, the shrubs, and the trees of George Washington's home caress us to-day. The same meadows which spread their fragrant beauty upon the lands of George Washington are the meadows which gladden your eyes about your own homes. The growing things of the earth still grow as they did in George Washington's time.

The fields still yield their abundance as did his fields at Mount Vernon. The shadows of the passing clouds moved in cooling procession upon his farm as they do upon yours. God in His infinite mercy has willed that nature will ever be as it was in the beginning.

Changes come to our cities. Changes affect our Government. Changes have wrought miracles of industrial and commercial development. But still the corn grows, still the wheat ripens, and still the trees spread their restful shadows about us as they did when George Washington looked out upon the beauty of the world from the porch at Mount Vernon.

But the earth renews the abundance and it has not changed. Neither have the hearts of men changed. There is still in the world the same love, the same nobility, the same devotion, and—thank Almighty God—the same loyalty which drew to George Washington the love and devotion of his own countrymen.

And who would say that, after all, merciful Heaven has not preserved to us the best in life? The sunshine, the gentle rain, the unchanging affection, and the loyalty of the human heart, are these not greater than imperial cities? Are they not more important to human happiness than all the miracles of the industrial advancement?

Neighborliness is essentially a product of the open air. It is fostered by those who have room to live and love and labor. It preserves to humanity the sweetest and most enobling qualities of the minds and hearts of our people.

The farmer of Mount Vernon felt this influence more strongly than any other that affected his life. From the turmoil of battle, from the perplexities of the council chamber, he returned to the soil. He looked up into the heaven above him and felt that among the trees and flowers and meadows of his beloved Mount Vernon he would be nearer to God.

Here he found peace and here upon the banks of the lovely Potomac, lulled to sleep by the flower-scented breezes, he lies in everlasting rest, in the bosom of the earth which in life he loved so well. He sleeps but his spirit lives on. His spirit is with us to-day. It brings us the inspiration of hope, of strength, of courage.

In death, as in life, he is still the leader. He is still finding the way, still calling upon us, his fellow Americans, to go forward; and as the flag of our country casts its glorious benediction over the peaceful loveliness of Mount Vernon, so within its protecting folds you and I, my fellow countrymen, carry on under the living symbol of that which George Washington left us.

Look up, my fellow Americans, at the glory which shines about you. Look beyond the ground mists of doubt and the fog of uncertainty into the clean radiance of our own national life and behold the immortal grandeur of our country, our Government, our people. Is it not comforting to realize that, although some functional weaknesses in our Government need attention, the structure itself is sound?

Look up, my fellow Americans, at the flag of our country that waves above you. Its glory is undimmed. Its beauty is untarnished. Its symbolism of a united America is still, as always, strong, courageous, unafraid. Look up at the eternal stars set upon the background of heaven itself and heed not the passing storm.

America, as always, will stand, because it is based upon the immutable foundation of human rights, human freedom, and equal opportunity. The God of Nations, who set that symbol in the sky, will not desert it. The Ruler of all, who gave strength and purpose and inflexible determination to George Washington and led him through the agony of war and the perplexities of nation building, is still watchful, still merciful, still the protecting Father. And in perfect faith we commend ourselves and our country to Him, from whose hands the centuries fall like grains of sand.

WHY I FOUGHT THE SALES TAX

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by myself, published in the Spotlight of August, 1932:

My fight against the sales tax was just part of a legislative day's work. It is not the first, and I hope not the last, time that I shall oppose special legislation secretly inspired for the sole benefit of predatory interests. The opposition to the sales tax was, perhaps, emphasized in that its defeat was so unexpected by the few who would have benefited by it. They believed that the machine had been so well oiled that not only would the sales tax be imposed on the people of the country but that they would also be rid of the income tax. Such a plan was practically announced, though ill-timed for legislative purposes, in a strong signed editorial by William Randolph Hearst, appearing in all of his chain of newspapers, and particularly in the Washington Herald of March 13, 1932, when he stated:

"When the Democratic Party has the sincerity to be democratic, when it has the patriotism to be American, it will substitute excise taxation and sales taxation for undemocratic, un-American discriminatory income taxation with its crooked evasion and equally crooked enforcement."

The plan to substitute the sales tax for the income-tax system was again disclosed in a leading article in the American Bankers' Association Journal of December, 1930; in fact, it is more than a revelation of the plan, it is quite an open threat that unless the politicians did so they would hear from the bankers in the 1932 election. They do not say whether in votes or contributions. This is what the American Bankers' Association Journal said in its December, 1930, issue:

"A deficit [Treasury] • • • would be apparent in 1931 and more apparent in 1932.

"How could it be met? There are two ways: One is to decrease outlays; the other to increase revenues. The former method seems to offer little hope, if any. The latter would involve an increase in the income-tax rates, if we are to adhere strictly to our present form of levying taxes. It seems inconceivable that the political party in power would raise rates either in 1931 or 1932, with a presidential election in the offing.

"Yet the dilemma must be met. How? Advocates of the sales tax assert that their proposal offers a fair and equitable solution."

Substitution of the sales tax for our present income tax has been lingering in the minds of the income-tax payers for many years. Not only that, but these taxpayers enjoying huge incomes running into the millions are even willing to pass their own blunders and the cost of the World War on to the next generation, providing, of course, they personally can be relieved of paying income taxes. There would be no appeal for a "balanced Budget" if income taxes were abated.

The Bache Review, characterized by its publishers as "A summary of the general financial and business situation, published every week by J. S. Bache & Co., members of New York Stock Exchange, Chicago Board of Trade, New York Cotton Exchange, New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange, New York Cocoa and Rubber Exchange, and other leading exchanges," surely must speak for the stock-ticker boys and the pluggers of foreign bonds. In its issue of January 21, 1928, it leads off with an article entitled "Why Not the Sales Tax?" It says:

"Less than 10,000 taxpayers contributed half of the total income tax. Out of a total population of 114,000,000 people, there are only 2,500,000 individuals and about 250,000 corporations with 3,000,000 or more stockholders who pay any income tax at all.

"How different would be the situation if a general sales or turnover tax were adopted. Such a tax would be spread out over so vast a number of people that each would pay only a very little, the amount depending upon the large or small spending of each, and the sum realized would be so vast that practically no other tax assessment would be needed to run the Government. Nobody would feel any burden, and, in fact, few would know that it was being paid, as it would be added to the cost of the thing bought and the addition would be infinitesimally small." (Italics mine.)

Later on the Bache Review made this contribution to our fiscal system in a subparagraph entitled "Business Benefit v. Debt Reduction." It stated:

"The National Industrial Conference Board, which is the speaking organ of thousands of sound business men in every part of the country, definitely urges that Treasury surpluses be applied to tax reduction in preference to rapid debt retirement, arguing that the compulsory sinking-fund appropriations give assurance that the redemption of the debt will progress satisfactorily, even if tax revision should altogether eliminate further surpluses.

"'The country will benefit more,' it says, 'from the encouragement to business which would follow a reduction of the present tax rates and from the removal of incidental abuses in the present tax system than it would through a more rapid reduction of the Federal debt.'"

In other words, no necessity of a balanced Budget; no need of reducing our national debt as long as income taxes are reduced. Reduce the taxes and pass the debts and cost of the war on to the next generation. Balance the Budget only if the consumers and wage earners will pay the taxes. Is it any wonder the House of Representatives overwhelmingly defeated the sales tax?

The expectation in certain quarters for a sales tax was quite reasonable considering the fact that the sales tax was inserted in a bipartisan, harmonious report of the Ways and Means Committee. The defeat of the sales-tax provision under the circumstances is one of the rare exceptions in taxation history of the American Congress. It was not a difficult legislative task to defeat the sales tax. It was decisively killed in both committees of the House and Senate in 1921.

Sales tax had been whispered in dark corners, in high-stake ticker houses, it had been talked about at jockey clubs, it had been discussed in banking circles, it had been prayed for in conclaves of loan sharks, it might even have been promised by politicians over a friendly highball in discussing campaign contributions, but no one had ever dared, up to a few hours before it was reported by the committee, to discuss it and advocate it openly in either the House or Senate for many years. It was not in the national platform of either Democratic or Republican Party in 1928 or 1924 or 1920. In fact, the Democratic platform of 1924 specifically denounced a sales tax. Neither party would have dared to go before the country in favor of a sales tax, and I venture the guess that neither party will this year advocate a sales tax. The reason for that is simple. The sales tax, now called the manufacturers' tax, is the same vicious, unfair system of taxing the great number unable to pay, while relieving the few of their just taxes. There must be something sinister about this system of taxation when politicians of all parties hesitate to openly advocate it, but some politicians are committed to it by reason of some private or secret party or personal promise.

A conservative estimate of the expected revenue from the sales tax defeated in the House of Representatives on April 1 1932, placed the figure at $660,000,000. Both proponents and opponents of the measure agreed that the figure was very conservative and low. The proponents purposely kept the estimate low to conceal, if possible, the true purpose of this tax. In a leading article in the American Bankers' Association Journal of December, 1930, the figures are very carefully worked out and estimated a sales tax of 2 per cent would yield about $1,000,000,000 annually. Therefore the proposed tax of 2¼ per cent which the House defeated would, according to the figures of the Bankers' Association Journal, and they know, have yielded at least $1,250,000,000. Just think of it, this tax from one source to be paid by the consuming public.

That it would have exempted the necessaries of life is not true, as I will show later. It would have provided the justification for a reduction of other taxes which would have been taken from the higher brackets of incomes. By that I mean instead of increasing, as the House did, the income taxes on net incomes, let me repeat that net incomes of $100,000, $200,000, $300,000, $500,000, $700,000, $1,000,000 and over a year, the plan of the sales taxers was to lower these rates and eventually wipe them out entirely. It is, therefore, not strange that the defeat was taken so hard by taxpayers who stood to save several thousand and several hundred thousand in their taxes annually. In fact, the propaganda started by them is still going on.

The sales tax was sprung on the House suddenly and came as a complete surprise. So struck was the House that it did not catch its breath for 48 hours. This, I believe, was the cause of creating the general belief that the House had accepted the committee's sales-tax recommendation.

That the House was surprised is quite natural. A new revenue bill was necessary. The financial condition of the Treasury made additional taxes to raise the additional revenues imperative. The Ways and Means Committee commenced its labors without delay. It held hearings for 16 days. It sat in executive session for nearly three weeks. I was the third witness to appear before that committee. Secretary Mellon made a brief statement, but long enough to frankly and plainly state that a sales-tax plan had been rejected by the Treasury Department.

Mr. Mellon said: "In the development of our program many possible forms of taxation were considered. We laid aside all thought of a general sales or turnover tax, not only because generally speaking it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character, but because of the great administrative difficulties involved and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales. The objections to a general sales tax are not in this respect applicable to a tax on selective articles of the character heretofore employed in this country and now recommended" (p. 4 of the hearings). This statement was made by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, who up to that time was hailed by the big-money boys as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton. Many of the opponents of the sales tax can easily absorb the attempted punishment that is now being handed out and the abuse and misinterpretation and deliberate misstatements that are being made concerning them because of their opposition to the sales tax. But how do the sales taxers account for Mr. Mellon? The then Under Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. Ogden L. Mills, now the Secretary of the Treasury, made a long, elaborate, detailed statement to the House committee presenting the Treasury program—not a word was said, suggested, or even remotely intimated of a sales tax. How could he? Only just a few weeks prior to this time he emphatically, clearly, and unequivocally expressed his opposition to a sales tax or a manufacturers' tax and frankly admitted that it was not capable of administration in this country. Speaking before the Economic Club of New York on December 14, 1931, Mr. Mills said:

"The attainment of our goals necessitates additional revenue in excess of $900,000,000 in the year 1933. In the development of a program we considered many forms of taxation. We weighed, for instance, the merits of the general sales or turnover tax, but rejected it, not only because it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character, but because of the enormous administrative difficulties and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales.

"We studied the limited manufacturers' or producers' sales tax, which is being administered with a fair degree of success in Canada. * * * The tax is unquestionably passed on and adds, therefore, to the cost of living."

"With some 200,000 manufacturing establishments in the United States, our much more extensive and complicated industrial mechanism, our tendency to set out administrative procedure with almost meticulous accuracy in our statutes, and our reluctance to grant administrative discretion or the authority to administrative officers to make final decisions, it is more than doubtful whether the Canadian sales tax would meet with the success in our country that it has across the border. * * *

"In any event, we concluded that, on the whole, it is wiser for us to resort to those forms of taxation with which we have had experience and are thoroughly familiar rather than to embark on new and untried ventures."

It would seem that the entire Treasury Department of the United States has given the sales tax a great deal of study, and all of them seem to have at one time or other expressed themselves against it. I note in Current Problems in Taxation, compiled by Lamar T. Beman, an interesting reference to testimony of Arthur A. Ballantine, the present Under Secretary of the Treasury. On page 189 of this work we find—

"Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney at law, New York City, formerly Solicitor of Internal Revenue, says, page 32, hearings National Industrial Tax Committee:

"'I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everywhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

"'I believe that this committee, by the very careful and exhaustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and its careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of business men into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility.'"

When Mr. Mills was asked his views on the sales tax, he frankly stated the department's rejection of such a plan, but added that the department had asked Dr. Thomas S. Adams and Mr. E. C. Alvord, whom he designated as tax experts, to go to Canada, and that if the committee were interested in a sales tax these gentlemen could give the committee a detailed report of their investigation. Now, briefly, let us see what these distinguished experts stated to the committee on the subject of the sales tax.

Doctor Adams testified: "Whether you should have a sales tax or not is a question for you gentlemen, largely a question of policy; but this, I think, is a common-sense conclusion—that it is not worth your while to adopt a Canadian sales tax for a short period of time, because to put it over you ought to have an administrative machine so well built up and so large that you would not be justified in creating it for a temporary tax of two or three years." The above is very interesting, particularly when the outrageous sales tax had been suggested by some only as a temporary measure. In fact, in the bill itself the sales tax was authorized for one year only!

Mr. Alvord stated: "I agree with Doctor Adams that as an emergency measure I think it would be subject to very serious consideration as to whether it would be worth while to interject the entire machinery for a short period of time. If you could hurdle the exemptions, and if you could vest the necessary finality in the administrative officers, then I think the general manufacturers' tax would be practical and capable of sound administration. If you are going to let everybody litigate every possible question, then I think you would be headed toward a very different and impossible situation."

The Hon. CHARLES CRISP, the acting chairman, asked Mr. Alvord this pointed question:

"Mr. CRISP. Mr. Alvord, I would like to ask you one question. I know you to be a high type of American citizen and a taxpayer and thoroughly familiar with the administration of tax laws in the Treasury Department and the difficulties confronting the administration of the law. You are also familiar with the situation so far as Congress is concerned in levying taxes. Under those conditions and the knowledge you have, and as an American citizen, do you favor the levying of a general sales tax?

"Mr. ALVORD. At the present time; no, sir."

Mr. George W. Jones, of the Department of National Revenue of Canada, appeared before the committee and made a statement on the Canadian sales tax. When one turns to the page indexed and indicated, it only shows a statement made by Mr. Jones to an unofficial group of Members of Congress who visited Canada last November. Just what Mr. Jones told the Committee on Ways and Means officially, strange to say, does not appear in the record. In this unofficial group who visited Canada last November as the guests of a prominent American publisher, an enthusiast of the sales-tax system, there were 44 Members of the House, of whom 23 voted against the sales tax, 17 in favor, and 4 did not vote.

The truth is the committee itself never expected to report a sales tax in the revenue bill. Some one put it over. I suspect that some one to be Mr. Bernard Baruch, of New York. He was very active in and around the offices of prominent members of the Ways and Means Committee. He is a very likable chap, well informed and exceptionally able. I must say he knows his subjects and can give a most convincing sales talk on any proposition in which he is interested. He is modest and unassuming, except he has a weakness for mingling and becoming useful and popular in circles not his own. I do know that he depicted a most pathetic picture and pointed to a most dismal future one evening to the tired and overworked members of the committee. I think it was that late evening talk and the fatigue of these gentlemen that got the sales tax over on the Ways and Means Committee. I happen to know the forcefulness of this particular argument, with its final dramatic climax, for Mr. Baruch himself practiced it on me and my colleague from Minnesota, the young and unusually able statesman, PAUL KVALE, for three hours on the train from New York to Washington that same afternoon, but it did not register.

Whatever happened, out of a clear sky announcement was made that the Ways and Means Committee had completed its bill and had agreed on a sales tax. The rest is now history.

For the past 10 years the big interests have been silently working for the enactment of a sales tax. A real drive was made in 1921. This drive got to the point of having the sales-tax proposition considered by both the House and Senate committees. The desire for lower income taxes and a sales tax at that time was similar to that now before us. In 1920–21 the drive was centered against the excess-profits tax which held over from the war period. The excess-profits tax was repealed under the so-called Mellon plan and a sales tax was not heard of for a few years. Then the movement was commenced for a change in the income-tax system and the sales tax again revived and offered as an entering wedge. When I say the entering wedge it is just that, for again referring to our banker friends in the American Bankers' Association Journal article from which I have quoted, in urging the sales tax it states: "When a change in rate is desirable there will be no need for redrafting a whole law. Only one word need be changed. Instead of saying 1 per cent, we can substitute three-fourths of 1 per cent, and a new rate is enacted. The sales tax is the most effective, the most just, and the most equitable of all taxes. Its adoption is only a question of time." Thus say the bankers. That bears out the desperate efforts made to get a sales tax written into the law. I am violating no secret when I state that when the 2¼ per cent sales tax was beaten in the House a 1 per cent was suggested, a half of 1 per cent was suggested, any percentage as long as Congress would write into the law the principle of a sales tax. The purpose of it is revealed in the bankers' article just quoted and any articles which are of record from the same and similar sources as far back as April, 1920. The sales tax is by no means a new subject. Way back in 1892, 40 years ago, in Public Opinion of April 23, 1892, the distinguished statesman from Massachusetts, the Hon. ROBERT LUCE, now a Member of the House of Representatives, stated:

"It needs no argument to show that the standard of consumption inequitably distributes the burden. The millionaire, with his income of $50,000 a year, can not eat or wear a hundred times as much as the day laborer with his income of $500 a year. Nor in the ordinary course of events does he spend a hundred times as much on travel, horses, furniture, or any of the other luxuries of life. Taking the country through, it is safe to say that expenditure does not increase in proportion to property or income. The conclusion is inevitable that the poorer a man is, the larger his proportionate share of the burden of taxation; whereas, if there were to be any inequality whatever, the richer a man the larger relatively should be his share."

No better or more applicable description has been phrased to show the inequity of a sales tax.

In the Commoner of August, 1921, William Jennings Bryan, the founder of that once famous paper, wrote:

"An effort is being made by those who represent 'big business' to shift the burden of taxes from the profiteers to the masses. First, they demand the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution of other taxes that burden all. The excess-profits tax is the most just tax there is—it is collected from those who collect excess profits—that is, larger profits than they should. It is the only tax that a taxpayer can avoid by his own act—let him stop stealing and he will not have to divide with the Government. And yet this is the one tax that the reactionaries want repealed. The next demand is for the lowering of taxes on big incomes and an increase in the rate on smaller incomes—as bold a piece of piracy as was ever proposed."

In the June, 1921, issue of the American Federationist, the official organ of the American Federation of Labor, the late Samuel Gompers stated his opposition to the sales tax, which was then being talked of preparatory to its presentation to Congress:

"Perhaps the most iniquitous proposal that has been considered by Congressmen in the field of taxation is the sales tax as a substitute for the existing excess-profits tax. It would be difficult to devise a system of taxation more inequitable and more unjust than a sales tax. It would be far better to leave the system of taxation as it is, even with all of the inequalities of the income and excess-profits taxes, than to substitute these with the sales tax."

The viewpoint of organized labor has not changed since that time. When Congress a few weeks ago was again considering the sales tax the present president of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. William Green, ever alert and ready to protect the interests of the workers, addressed Congress in opposition to the sales tax, and said:

"The sales-tax provision of the pending taxation legislation is strongly opposed by the American Federation of Labor. This position of the American Federation of Labor is based upon its traditional opposition to all forms of sales-tax legislation. Whatever argument is offered in support of sales-tax legislation during periods of reasonable prosperity can not apply now. The existing economic situation adds to the strength of argument against the imposition of such a character of taxation. The sales tax would fall more heavily upon the masses of the people who are now suffering from unemployment than upon any other group of our citizenship. To add a sales tax to the reductions of wages which have been imposed upon wage earners during the last year would mean addition to the misery, woe, and want which now prevail throughout the land.

"How can men and women who are unable to buy the bare necessities of life be expected to pay a sales tax upon the limited merchandise which they are able to buy? This proposed manufacturers' sales tax will affect the sale of clothes, shoes, and a large percentage of foodstuffs. To impose this sales tax upon these necessities of life would mean that the masses, who are now purchasing only a limited amount, would be compelled to buy still less. It is a form of taxation which is contrary to the basis upon which we have always built our tax structure, namely, to relieve those who are least able and collect from those who are best able to pay."

Following this, the executives of 21 railroad-employee organizations wrote me on March 16, 1932, opposing the sales tax. Their communication authorizing me to so inform the House of Representatives of their position was as follows:

"The Railway Labor Executives' Association, representing the 21 standard railway-labor organizations in session at Washington, gave serious consideration to the manufacturers' sales tax now before Congress and heartily indorse the statement prepared by President William Green, American Federation of Labor, opposing this bill.

"We feel that any further tax imposed on the now-overburdened working people of America can not be justified under any circumstances."

To return to the sales-tax fight of 1921, we find that it was opposed then, as it is now, by every important national farm organization. In the United Farmers Forum of April, 1921, the article entitled "Dangers and Evils of the Sales Tax" says in part:

"During the war the principle of progressive taxation of income and of excess corporation profits became established. The American people accepted the principle of ability to pay, as well as the principle of payment for service rendered, as a just basis for taxation. Big financial and business interests, and particularly the profiteers who during the war made such enormous profits out of the patriotism of the American people, naturally opposed such a principle of taxation which was utterly repugnant to their conception of patriotism and which also reduced their profits materially."

At that time Mr. William H. Johnston, president of the International Association of Machinists, declared: "The sales or turnover tax would be the worst kind of 'grand larceny' in taxation and would be daily robbery, on a cruel scale, of those who haven't sufficient income to maintain an American standard of living."

Even prior to 1920 and during the Wilson administration the then Secretary of the Treasury also opposed a sales tax, for in the last annual report made by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. David F. Houston, referring to the sales tax, stated:

"In the Treasurer's opinion there are many objections to a sales tax. Further consideration of the subject has convinced me that a general sales or turnover tax is altogether inexpedient. It would apply not only to the necessities of life—the food and clothing of the very poor—but it would similarly raise the prices of the materials and equipment used in agriculture and manufactures. It would confer in effect a substantial bounty upon large corporate combinations and place at corresponding disadvantage the smaller or disassociated industries which carry on separately the business operations that in many combinations and trusts are united under one ownership."

The comparison between proponents in 1920–21 and 1931–32 for a sales tax is most interesting. It was proposed by the very same people who are proposing it now. It was urged for the same selfish reason that it is now. The big taxpayers then were seeking to be relieved of excess-profits taxes and to place them upon the consumers of the country. To-day the income tax is the objective of the drive. The same comparisons were made with the success of the sales tax in other countries as is now being made with Canada. The first example of a successful sales tax was the Philippines. That was not very impressive, so then they went to France, and the French sales tax was hailed as the model and ideal sales tax. That argument also collapsed completely. In the Wall Street Journal of September 20, 1921, there is an article there sent from Paris entitled "Sales Tax in France So Far Not Eucouraging." It states that the experiment in France does not look encouraging when the real figures are shown. In the 11 months' experiment there the sales tax was estimated to bring in 3,528,000,000 francs, but only 1,870,000,000 francs were collected, a difference of almost 50 per cent. So this time Canada has been held up as the model and constant comparisons made to it. Very little was said that the greatest portion of the sales tax received by Canada is from the sale of liquor and alcoholic beverages.

The Senate committee considered the sales tax very thoroughly during its consideration of the revenue bill of 1921 and dropped it like a red-hot coal. Mr. W. M. Clark, representing the four train-service organizations, stated before the committee:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in appearing before you to-day we do so as the representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, whose membership consists of approximately 600,000 citizens of the United States. These members and their families are vitally interested in the question of taxation, or any other question which may have a tendency to increase their existing cost of living.

"The question of the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution therefor of a sales or turnover tax has been called to the attention of the membership of the organizations we represent and an expression from them asked for, with the result that we find unanimous response from this membership being opposed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and likewise unalterably opposed to the enactment of a sales or turnover tax law. No doubt the various Members of the Senate and House of Representatives have received letters and resolutions of protest from the various divisions and lodges of these organizations protesting against this legislation."

A representative of the Farmer-Labor Party stated:

"These 18,000,000 families are now spending their entire incomes to keep alive; and in cases where it is possible, they are drawing upon savings to eke out their incomes. In all cases where these conditions obtain the burden of a sales tax will reduce the family purchasing power * * *."

Mr. A. E. Rhodes, representing the American-La France Fire Engine Co., of Elmira, N. Y., referring to the sales tax, frankly stated:

"It seems to me that if we are to pass a sales tax law we will pass along the tax; and as a business man I think we pass along every tax except the excess-profits tax. We will pass the sales tax along."

There are innumerable frank admissions of business man after business man who frankly admitted that the sales tax would be passed on to the consumers. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, so stated in his speech which I have quoted above. Mr. John Brayshaw, representing the National Association of Retail Grocers, appeared before the Senate committee in opposition to the sales tax and stated:

"The National Association of Retail Grocers has not held a meeting to become thoroughly familiar with this tax. We only know it as a tax on turnover, and we suppose that the tax is 1 per cent. The executive committee of the association is opposed to this thing, because they are opposed to being placed in the position of tax collectors if it can possibly be avoided. We have the record of the unpopularity of tax collectors 2,000 years ago; and while the grocers may be still sinners, we do not care to have them publicans also.

"The tax, it seems to us, would be rather indefinite because of the number of times it might be levied, and the amount of money that it might produce is rather vague; and for that reason we have grave doubts that it would accomplish the purpose for which it is proposed, and whether it would afford the relief that it is hoped by the repeal of other measures of taxation."

This should convince every housekeeper, every mother trying to balance her little family budget on a meager pay envelope that no matter what the bankers may say, or the politicians promise, and whether it is called a manufacturers' tax or sales tax, it is going to percolate right down to the corner grocery store, pyramided and added on every little purchase of groceries and other necessaries of life.

Prof. Fred Rogers Fairchild, of Yale University, also appeared before the Senate committee in 1921. The professor had given years of study to a sales tax and was then a recognized expert on the subject. He stated:

"The sales tax, in my opinion, is, first of all, a tax upon consumption; that is, the tax is bound to be ultimately shifted from the immediate taxpayer to the ultimate consumer of the goods. It is a tax which must rest as a burden on cost, being an addition to the cost of each unit of product; and since business can not normally go on producing at a loss, ultimately the consumers must pay this additional cost."

The line of witnesses, experts on the subject, and expressions could be continued indefinitely. Just one more thought to show the insincerity of some of the statements made in connection with this sales tax. Not once, but repeatedly, has it been stated that an offer was made in the House of Representatives to exempt food, clothing, and medicine, and farming implements. That offer was made. It was made in good faith by Representative CHARLES CRISP, the then acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—an able statesman, a thorough gentleman, and as fine and noble a character as ever sat in the House of Representatives. He made that offer in absolute good faith. The proponents of the sales tax outside of Congress heard of this offer with glee, because they believed that it might be accepted on the spur of the moment without careful investigation as to just what it meant. We took it under consideration that night, but it took but a few moments to see that while Mr. CRISP was acting in absolute good faith, it meant nothing to the consumer. Under the bill as it was drawn with its license system it would have been impossible to exempt clothing entirely, food entirely, medicine entirely, or farm implements entirely. This is the way it would have worked out. The law would require every manufacturer to take out a license. A sale to a licensed manufacturer was not taxed; but as soon as a sale was made to an unlicensed wholesaler or retailer or an unlicensed manufacturer, the tax would be applicable. Therefore, while a suit of clothes would have been exempt from the tax, the cloth, the lining, the thread, the buttons, and everything that went into that suit would have been taxed.

A pair of shoes under the offer would not have been taxed, but the leather, the soles, the eyelets, the shoe strings, and everything that went into the shoes would have been taxed. The same with medicine—true the prescription would not have been taxed, but everything that went into that prescription would have been taxed. The same as to foods—the cans, the bottles, the jars, the wrappers, the preparations would all be taxed. The same is true as to farmers' implements. The iron, the screws, the nuts, the wood, the chain, and every little gadget that went into a farmer's plow, harvester, or reaper would have been taxed. No one was more surprised than some of the members of the committee when it was disclosed how far-reaching the sale tax was. Not only did this disclose the impossibility of really and actually exempting the necessaries of life, but also disclosed the intricacies and the complicated system of taxation necessarily involved. That is exactly what the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, had in mind when he expressed the difficulty of administration. The sales tax in this country would bring about a wholesale evasion and disregard of law, graft and corruption equal to that of prohibition. Imagine licensed manufacturers being exempt for articles sold to other licensed manufacturers requiring a check-up of the amount manufactured and the final disposition. Just as the manufacturer of perfumery to-day must account for the alcohol which he withdraws on Government permits.

The millions of gallons of illicit liquor manufactured to-day are surreptitiously diverted from legitimate purposes, notwithstanding the hundreds and hundreds of agents constantly supervising permittees drawing such alcohol. Now imagine some 200,000 large manufacturing plants in this country. Some 300,000 more small plants and individuals manufacturing, and one can readily visualize the number of bootleg manufacturers that would spring up overnight just as fake perfumery manufacturers, fake soap manufacturers, fake tonics, and others of the like created after prohibition for the purpose of lawfully withdrawing alcohol and unlawfully diverting it. A bolt of cloth sold to a department store would be taxed and the mill would have to pay the tax, but the same mill selling a bolt of cloth to a clothing manufacturer would not pay the tax but it would be paid by the manufacturer. The temptation to divert in all lines of material and semifinished articles would be so great that it is well that we refused to spread corruption, graft, and evasion of law throughout our entire taxing system.

Thus the sales tax was beaten. The vote of 236 against it, 160 in favor, indicates the sentiment of the House. For the first time in many years sectional lines were entirely broken down. Often party lines are held intact. The vote against the sales tax shows that every section of the country was opposed to it. It was not a one man's fight. First honors go to the Hon. ROBERT DOUGHTON, who, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, held a strategic position, and his courage in protesting the sales tax from the outset gave great impetus to the movement. Skillful parliamentary attacks were made by the energetic gentleman from Arkansas, HEARTSILL RAGON, also a member of the Ways and Means Committee. RANKIN, of Mississippi; SWING and ENGLEBRIGHT, of California; SINCLAIR, of North Dakota; HOCH, of Kansas; DAVENPORT and FITZPATRICK, of New York; NELSON, of Maine; and RAMSEYER, of Iowa, were all key men from their respective sectors. It was the first time in a revenue bill that the old political game of keeping the sections of the country divided did not work. All of this, however, would not have been possible had it not been for the splendid sense of fair play displayed by the Speaker of the House, the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, and the equal fairness of HENRY RAINEY, of Illinois, the majority floor leader. Though RAINEY was for the sales tax, he did not take undue advantage of his position as floor leader and the gag rule was not applied. Both Mr. GARNER and Mr. RAINEY, before assuming control of the House, had many times protested the gag rule invoked by the Republicans in the consideration of tariff revenue bills. When it came to their turn they played the game fairly. It is only through gag rule, that is, invoking a special rule preventing full and frank consideration of a bill and limiting, if not prohibiting, the offering of perfecting amendments, which stifles the real expression of the House of Representatives, that it has been possible in the past to enact tariffs and tax bills written especially for favored interests. Therefore, I would say that the country owes a debt of gratitude to Speaker GARNER in carrying out the real principles of representative government.

COST OF VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1930, there was taken up in the House of Representatives for discussion and action, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date on page 7369, H. R. 10381, to amend the World War veterans' act of 1924. This was the so-called American Legion bill. This bill was later amended in the House of Representatives by the adoption of the so-called Rankin bill, H. R. 7285 of the Seventy-first Congress, and amendments extending the provisions of the American Legion bill to January 1, 1930, and prohibiting the Government from rebutting the testimony of any claimant.

This bill was so repugnant to anyone familiar with veterans' legislation or with any governmental interest whatever that I asked that my name be stricken from it and that it be known as the Rankin bill. It was later sent to the Senate, again amended, and vetoed by the President on June 26, 1930, as shown by veto message of the President, House of Representatives Document No. 495, Seventy-first Congress, second session.

In the debate concerning this bill varying estimates of its cost were made, from one estimate of the Veterans' Administration stating that 77,000 cases would come in under the original Rankin bill and that the cost would be $43,- 000,000 a year, to an estimate which I inserted in the RECORD, based on the experience of the Pension Bureau, that it would be several hundred million dollars per year. As a matter of fact the Veterans' Administration could not make an accurate estimate, as it was speculative as to the number of men that would apply if the bill were enacted into law.

Since that time, however, the act of July 3, 1930, the disability allowance law was enacted and has been in effect two years. Three hundred and ninety-six thousand men have taken advantage of the provisions of that law. Most of them would have come under the provisions of the Rankin bill at a greatly increased compensation rate, and the Veterans' Administration now estimates that the Rankin bill as vetoed by the President, during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, would have cost the Government $167,000,000 annually.

This figure would be for actual money paid for compensation only and does not take into consideration an additional $140,000,000 necessarily expended for hospitals, with an annual maintenance cost of $60,000,000 additional. The bill, therefore, vetoed by the President would have cost the Government during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, $227,000,000, or about $127,000,000 more than the disability allowance act of July 3, 1930, which was adopted.

These figures were prepared at my request by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and given me in a letter dated July 22, 1932, which I would have inserted in this RECORD except that permission has not been granted by the House of Representatives to do so.

Now that two years have expired since this debate, which is being used so viciously against President Hoover by his opponents, it can be shown definitely by his veto and the subsequent action of Congress 396,000 men were helped in a small degree because of disabilities not incurred in the military or naval service, while the Government would have been compelled to raise at least $127,000,000 more in its tax bill of 1932 had it not been for his action.

This bill would have compensated men for obesity, gout, and other diseases which they could not have possibly contracted in the service. Under this bill these non-service-connected cases, who were not injured in the service, would have received just as much in compensation as the men actually injured at Chateau-Thierry or in the Argonne.

Had the Rankin bill been enacted into law such a feeling of resentment would have come to the American people because of its provisions as to inculcate a feeling against veterans and their demands, which would have been the worst thing that could happen to them.

President Hoover's vetoes of veterans' legislation have been like the veto of the Rankin bill, which was so manifestly bad that its very provisions were disowned by the Democratic National Convention at Chicago and are disowned by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and every reputable veterans' organization. His veto of the special pension bill which gave to dishonorably discharged soldiers, deserters, and men suffering from diseases due to their own misconduct the same pensions that were given to our finest American citizen soldiers, deserves and is receiving the commendation of the great body of fine American ex-service men, the citizens of the same age who could not see service, and the 30,000,000 boys and girls who have come of age since the World War.

Responsible people everywhere are recognizing the fact that it is not fair that men suffering from chronic alcoholism, diseases due to their own misconduct, gout, obesity, or even suffering from any other disease with which they have been afflicted 13 years after the World War should be given the same compensation as the men and women that were in the service between the dates of April 6, 1917, and Armistice Day, November 11, 1918, when there actually was a war.

Somebody must pay these taxes, and the service men, under the tax bill of 1932, will pay with nearly every purchase they make some part of the bill, and those men, together with the mass of citizens, are demanding fair, equitable compensation and pension measures based on actual disability received in war and actual need where there is no war disability.

Due to the frailty of human nature and to the fact that none of us have had the same experiences in life, it is probable that few of us can entirely agree on measures for governmental, State, or municipal economy.

Yet we all recognize the necessity for it in the Government and in every subdivision of government.

As a rule, however, each individual desires to apply in the rule of economy something that will not affect him or his own interests. Yet there must be further governmental economy or the next session of Congress will be compelled to raise in taxation an additional $500,000,000 annually.

The economy bill enacted by the Congress recently and signed by the President is a distinct forward step. It has given the President some power to consolidate departments; it has reduced salaries on an average of 8⅓ per cent and in some departments has made necessary a further enforced furlough of from 30 to 60 days for Government employees. Its passage has focused attention upon State, county, municipal, township, and school district expenditures, just as the 1932 tax bill has definitely called to the attention of every citizen the fact that he must pay additional taxes. The income tax has been raised and everything from gasoline to electricity carries a specific, definite tax.

It has become increasingly self-evident that some reductions must be made in the compensations and pensions paid to veterans of our wars, because 25 cents of each governmental tax dollar to-day is going to them. It should be said that it is the veterans themselves in great numbers who have been the first to call attention to the necessity for a reduction in expenditures for veterans and to point out the inequalities, discriminations, and preferences in existing statutes. So far as World War veterans are concerned, the laws, with one exception, were enacted in the boom years of the United States when the burden of taxation apparently did not weigh down so heavily on our citizens.

Therefore the responsible veteran has been among the first to recognize that as the cost of living dropped—and it has dropped—the veteran as a good citizen can afford to take an equivalent reduction.

So apparent is this that responsible veterans' organizations, through their authorized agents, are attempting to show that their organizations were not responsible for some of the statutes that have been enacted, although it can not be shown that any veteran organization has opposed the enactment of any one of them, however discriminatory or unjust such measures have been to the public or to the veterans themselves.

Veterans as well as others are becoming tax conscious and realize the fact that 30,000,000 young men and women have become of age since the World War and must pay these taxes, and in their national conventions to be held this summer must courageously face the tax and pension situation which has developed and should themselves advocate the repeal of laws that are manifestly unfair as between groups of veterans and to the public as a whole.

If the Government, States, cities, counties, school districts, and townships are to take a reduction of expenditures, the veteran must do likewise.

It seems to be increasingly apparent that all of us agree compensation should be paid only for war-connected disabilities contracted in time of war, except in case of need and old age, where governmental policy has heretofore been established for some degree of pensions. These, however, can be considered only as gratuities and the men and women receiving them can not expect to be compensated, under any circumstances, as are the individuals wounded in actual combat or zone of advance.

A drastic revision of the laws is necessary. Congress in the economy bill provided for a joint committee of the House and Senate to make the required survey of existing laws and regulations, and that committee is appointed and through its agents is commencing to function. It must, and in my judgment will, proceed in its investigation and recommendations ruthlessly but fairly. It must remove discriminations and preferences which have crept into the law through the years between diseases and injuries equally disabling. At the present time there are rank discriminations and rank preferences. Immense estates aggregating as much as $20,000 have been built up for incompetent ex-service men, with no relatives, who showed no sign of disease or disability until six years after the close of the World War and who never saw service prior to the armistice.

Presumptions of disability have been given by statute to certain specific diseases which are not warranted.

The people and Congress are responsible for the situation, and it is up to them to right that which should be righted.

I have become convinced that an executive department is not the place for final adjudication of veterans' claims. Our Government is a government built upon the theory that every citizen has the right to a judicial determination of his rights. The existing situation can be cured only by the establishment of a court or courts to which the claimant and the Government may appeal doubtful cases and secure a final decision. It may take several of these courts in the beginning, but in a very few years the cases will be finally adjudicated.

There are some cases where allowances have not been made by the Government that might be allowed by court. There are many of them in the different jurisdictions where competent evidence will show that allowances have been made that should not have been made. Whatever may be the case, both the citizen and the Government are entitled to justice and to justice based on our form of Government of judicial determination. Until that is done, neither the service men nor the citizens who did not see service will be satisfied with the situation as it exists nor the tax bills that are paid.

Representative SIMMONS of Nebraska, an ex-service man with a fine record, and myself, have introduced resolutions in the House of Representatives providing for the creation of such tribunals and the elimination of some of the boards now in the Veterans' Administration, so that there would be little if any additional cost of adjudication. These measures will be considered by the committee appointed by Congress to survey the relationship of the veteran to the Government.

Although I have discussed largely in this address veterans' legislation, it is not the most important to the average citizen in the amount of taxation required. The organizations believing in economy should consolidate and see to it that the reduction in Government expenses does not fall entirely on the veteran but falls upon every needless, useless governmental, State, or municipal activity.

Taxpayers' leagues and economy leagues can well sweep their own doorsteps and their own home communities before they finish with the broom they are using on the veteran or governmental affairs.

There is a tax consciousness to-day that we have never had before, but that tax consciousness should be so controlled as to lead only to reductions that are fair and just to the individual and the community.

RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, when the so-called relief bill was before the House on a number of occasions toward the end of the session, it was always in connection with some particular amendment or other change in the bill so that there was no appropriate opportunity for a general discussion of the bill itself. For this reason I am taking advantage of the general leave to extend remarks in the RECORD to express some views of my own on the subject of relief legislation as it was considered during the session just closed.

There was no difference of opinion among Members of Congress as to the general disposition to support any measure calculated to afford genuine relief under existing conditions. The real question to be decided was whether a proposed measure would probably bring relief, or whether in the long run it would be more likely to bring grief. From the beginning of the present session of Congress there seemed to be two distinct, divergent views on the subject of relief. One was that regardless of the condition of the Treasury, Congress should make huge appropriations either for direct relief or for public works and other governmental activities that might bring employment to labor.

Large bond issues were proposed by some as a means of securing the funds for these large expenditures, while others boldly proposed to issue fiat money in such quantities as to cheapen the purchasing power of the dollar or, as was sometimes stated, create a mild inflation.

Still others contended that at all hazards the Budget should be balanced, that no fiat money should be issued, and that no additional expenditures should be made for public works or anything else not absolutely necessary that would require immediate or future increase in taxation. My own views coincide more nearly with the last-described class.

So long as values of every kind were increasing, the taxpayer readily paid increasing amounts without breaking under the strain. As soon, however, as values of all kinds began shrinking, the taxpayer found it increasingly difficult to carry the load, and business, already depressed, suffered more and more severely from the burden of taxation.

To my mind, it is evident that no amount of revenues that could be collected by taxation and expended upon public works or other governmental activities could possibly relieve more than a negligible part of the present unemployment. The total amount of funds that could be raised by the sale of bonds at reasonable rates would not be sufficient to make a serious impression upon the unemployment situation. Nothing can fully relieve the unemployment situation but a revival of business activity to something like its normal state, and anything that would prevent the return of business activity is sure to prevent a return of normal employment. Surely no amount of employment that ever could or should be furnished by the Government to be paid for by taxation can do more than serve as a negligible palliative.

Nothing to-day bears so heavily upon business or is doing so much to retard its recovery as oppressive taxation made necessary by past and prospective expenditures. It is my settled conviction that any so-called relief measure that either adds now or in the future more tax burdens is not only not calculated to bring relief but will, on the contrary, bring grief by preventing legitimate business from resuming its proper function of providing work for all who are able and desire to work. Therefore, every proposed relief measure that will necessitate additional taxes now or that will impose additional public debt to be paid with interest in the future should be scrutinized most critically before being adopted.

I am not in favor of any appropriation for so-called public works that are not absolutely necessary, unless already in process of construction so that a failure to continue the work would mean loss.

So far as public buildings are concerned, it is well known that their construction furnishes only a limited amount of employment to labor and, when constructed, not only do not pay for themselves but as a rule become a permanent charge of considerable magnitude upon the Government for their maintenance. It is certain that the average post-office building, in addition to the original outlay, costs very much more for its maintenance than would be required to pay for rent, heat, light, and janitor service in private buildings.

To sum up, it may be said that the greatest handicap to recovery of business to-day is the burden of taxation now being borne in Federal, State, and municipal governments. No tax burden should now be imposed that can possibly be avoided. No public works of any kind should be constructed under present conditions that are not absolutely necessary unless they be of a character that will produce sufficient income to eventually pay for themselves.

The public debt should not be further increased because it materially affects the national credit, thereby increasing the cost of government for years to come.

The people should not be encouraged to look to the Government to furnish employment or other relief except to administer as economically as possible the necessary activities of the Government itself. The people should look toward a revival of business and the encouragement of private enterprise as the only hope of restoring normal employment. And they should realize that every additional burden by taxation or otherwise placed upon legitimate business and private enterprise will to that extent retard the recovery so essential to a restoration of normal employment conditions.

UNDER THE CHERRY TREES

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me at Tidal Basin April 13, 1932, after introducing the Japanese Ambassador:

It is rarely the privilege of any American to take part in such an inspiring program as is being presented to-day beneath this glorious canopy of cherry blossoms in the Nation's Capital.

As I stand here in the presence of this distinguished company to express the inspiring thought that come to me, I can, in memory, retrace the years to the fairyland of my childhood. My heart responds to this scene as the most bewitching abode of elfin beauty ever unrolled before human eyes.

Above me, and all about, framing the edges of the lovely tidal basin as far as the eye can see, are the most gorgeous, most colorful, blossom-laden trees in all America.

We are here to celebrate the great national cherry-blossom season that is famed throughout the world. The Nation's Capital has given this event peculiar significance. Every spring as the masses of these famed petals burst into riotous and almost inconceivable splendor the people of Washington and from all other parts of the country revel in God's benediction of flowers, spread so generously for our enjoyment and spiritual refreshment.

In this atmosphere of fragrance and of glowing, vital loveliness, who dare question the beneficence of that Providence that spreads such heavenly reflection all about us? Who would deny the Divinity which holds in the hollow of His hand these bright testimonials of His love and remembrance?

You have heard from His Excellency the Japanese Ambassador the story of the cherry-blossom festival in Japan. He has told us of the significance of this fete and what the blossoms mean to his beauty-loving country. We, in America, have been the beneficiaries of that romantic and poetical nature, and we are fast learning the real meaning of this feast of flowers from those who have adored them for centuries.

We, too, are learning how to understand and appreciate the transcendent influence of this floral baptism that lifts us above the sordid things of life and exalts our souls to God.

Here we have vivid and impressive proof of that immortality of the good and the beautiful which is the guiding light of human life.

Here, in this significant year which marks the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, we stand amidst a scene which would have delighted his soul. I believe that if George Washington should revisit in human form this city of his dreams he would pass by every great monument and marble structure and come to the quiet shores of this wonderful basin reflecting all about its borders the blossom-laden trees. Here the deep emotions of the great man would yield in communion with the Giver of all good.

We are in the habit of thinking of George Washington in his more heroic and austere rôles. With his name we hear the clash of war or feel the hush of momentous decisions of statecraft. But George Washington loved beauty. He himself has attested this in his many references to the cultivation of flowers and shrubs and trees upon his beloved estate at Mount Vernon.

There survives to us his own garden of exquisite taste and floral harmony. We know that George Washington spent many hours in that garden, where the calm, peaceful, uplifting beauty quieted his soul.

So here in this magnificent Capital of the great country which he established we have come to witness a scene in which his splendid manhood would have found inspiration and delight.

I know of no more appropriate honor we could offer to George Washington than these exquisite flowers that are blooming here to-day.

It may be that a man's spirit is only that memory of him which lives on as long as there are human hearts to give it a dwelling place. If that is so, then Washington's spirit is certainly here. For on this spot are centered some of those things which we know he prized above all others.

Beyond these trees which surround us like an immortal caress are other trees of similar kind, bordering the beautiful Potomac which Washington loved throughout his lifetime.

It was his river as this is his city. George Washington's own life was one of the most beautiful things that has ever been given to mankind. But one of the elements that made it so was Washington's love of beauty and his lifelong efforts to bring beauty upon the earth about him. He would see that every blossom on these branches is more than a flower. It is a thought born of God. It is a symbol of peace as well as a gesture of international good will from one nation to another.

He wished for the National Capital that it should be magnificent as well as important. But he also wished that it would be beautiful as a habitation for the very soul of his people, and these lovely trees of world-wide fame are helping us to make it so.

We think of these trees as blossoming for a short time like a loving garland about this quiet water. But they are blooming forever in the lives of all who have seen them and remember them. They are beautifying human lives wherever they are known.

George Washington would be the first to realize that it is human thought, even more than the hand of nature, which has spread such loveliness here. He would see the literal flowering of one of his fondest dreams—a world dedicated to the cultivation of peace and harmony and delighting in graceful exchanges.

In these flowers nature has given us her finest language to voice our gladness and our gratitude that George Washington once lived to render all life a nobler thing and to spread good will throughout the world.

That is what I mean in saying that nothing could be more fittingly dedicated to George Washington's memory this year than these ravishing garlands adorning his beloved city in its springtime, and signifying one of his dearest wishes "that mankind be connected like one great family in fraternal ties."

In the name of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, created to lead this country in its honors to George Washington in 1932, I wish to express something that we all know Washington would feel and say on such an occasion—the thanks of his heart to the gracious wife of a later President, and to the representatives of a friendly nation, for the thought that has brought to our Capital these enrichments—beautiful for so many beautiful reasons.

RETIRING FROM CONGRESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I have decided not only not to be a candidate for reelection to the Seventy-third Congress but as soon as it is practicable, without expense or inconvenience to my constituents, to elect some one to fill my place, it is my purpose to resign my seat in the present Congress. Making this decision at this time does not necessarily mean that I am permanently retiring from the public service. That will depend upon circumstances as they may develop. I would have it understood beyond question that my country is always first and that no sacrifice is too great for me to make at any time in case the importance of the service seems to demand it.

At considerable personal sacrifice, so far as personal fortune is concerned, I have served the people of my district, the State of Connecticut, and the Nation for 11 terms in the Congress of the United States. These 22 years cover a very important period in our history and the work at times has been somewhat strenuous, so that no one may rightfully accuse me of not having done my share of public service or of now shirking a public duty if for a time I ask to be relieved from this particular service so as to engage in other work which for the time at least seems more important.

It is well known that the legitimate necessary expenses of a Member of Congress who tries to fully discharge the duties of his office and fittingly represent a great constituency require his entire salary. A position which requires the holder to make an expensive campaign every two years is quite a different matter from any other position, public or private, that pays nominally the same salary. It is, in fact, impracticable for him to lay by anything for his family or the future. While still blessed with health and vigor it is my hope and purpose to try to make amends to some extent for what I have failed to do in this direction during the last score of years.

When I first came to Congress, in 1909, I left, as many others do who come to Congress, an active, remunerative law practice. My two partners were then at the very top of the Connecticut bar and were two of the finest men it has ever been my good fortune to know. They believed that I had certain qualities fitting me specially for useful public service and therefore did not discourage me from making what was even then a great pecuniary sacrifice. Since that time I have watched those who were then my juniors rise to my place in the firm and to higher places so far as pecuniary reward is concerned, while I have labored here, as everyone must who lives on his salary, for mere living expenses. Not that I would complain, for there have been many rich compensations not of a financial character, and I would not exchange the satisfaction of having done my work here faithfully and well for any amount of money. Furthermore, if the service I might reasonably expect to render here during the next few years appeared to be of an importance comparable to that I had the privilege of rendering during the last three Congresses under Republican control, I should still deem it my duty to stay here just as long as my own people approve.

Under present conditions, however, I doubt whether the importance of my service here is sufficient to justify me in further sacrificing what may prove to be my last opportunity to provide somewhat more adequately for my family and future, and, therefore, I feel warranted in making this decision at this juncture.

Mingled emotions naturally arise as one contemplates closing a long term of service in the House of Representatives. It is said that it takes all kinds of people to make up a world. The variety is not quite so great in Congress, but it exists even here. I suppose that if all of us were as good as the best of us, none of us would ever quit Congress willingly. While if all of us were as bad as the worst of us, probably there would be little satisfaction in any one of us staying here. It would be delightfully pleasant if we might truthfully say that the entire membership of Congress were high-minded, courageous, fair, considerate of others, generous in thought and deed, but alas, one can not say so as to all and be truthful. Along this line it is perhaps not safe to go further than to say that the average in this regard is high. Many conform to the high standard I have described, and as one thinks of ceasing to serve with colleagues of this type there is sure to be a pang of regret.

The House of Representatives as a whole and in the aggregate is a fine, truly representative body of men and women. Statements so often made by the press and would-be humorists to the contrary are inaccurate and unfair. Theorists and alleged writers on government have argued and attempted to demonstrate, with considerable show of logic, it must be admitted, that universal suffrage must inevitably lead to the rule of the mediocre and the incompetent. Thus far in our history, however, through patriotism, or a proper desire for the honor conferred by election to public office, it has come to pass that a high grade of men and women have continued to be willing to serve, often at a sacrifice, and constituencies continue to elect them. So long as this continues to be true, the country is safe.

Deep as is my regret in contemplating leaving the House, it is still deeper as I think of ceasing to serve the particular people who have trusted me and honored me with high office for more than a quarter of a century. Four years I served in the State legislature, two years as the speaker. Then a larger constituency sent me here, and for almost 22 years I have stood for them in this Chamber until for many in my district I have become more than a mere Representative—I have become an institution. To give up this character of relationship where so many, even without regard to party lines, have come to know me, to believe in me, and to trust me, is indeed a difficult thing to do. All I can say is that having assiduously worked for them and proved myself faithful to them and to their interests, I believe that they will not now begrudge me the privilege for a while of working for myself, or at any rate for my family and their future. I have, therefore, decided to seek activity in other fields where I trust my talents will be equally well employed and where I hope the net financial return for my labors will at least be on the right side of the ledger.

DEMOCRATIC TARIFF HYPOCRISY

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a political party is entitled to the serious and respectful consideration of its viewpoint on every issue upon which it has a conviction. But in this campaign any Democratic orator who rises to discuss the tariff and to denounce in the old familiar terms the "iniquities" of the Hawley-Smoot Act will make himself ridiculous.

In the last three years the Democratic Party has preached tariff reduction with fanatic zeal, at the same time practicing protective policies for favored interests and resorting to every device known to the hypocrite and the demagogue to fool the people.

This is a harsh indictment. I shall sustain it by the Democratic record, the damning and incontrovertible evidence of which I now introduce:

INITIAL DEMOCRATIC DUPLICITY

When the present tariff law was under consideration in the Senate every Democratic Member of that body cast votes either for increased rates or to prevent the decrease of rates. This was done while their colleagues shouted from the stump of the "iniquities" which were at that moment being clinched into the bill by Democratic votes. On record ballots alone a total of 1,010 votes were cast by Democratic Senators for high duties.

Senate Democrats, with the aid of recalcitrant Republicans, could have passed the kind of a tariff bill they professed to have desired.

That they failed to do so is due not to a desertion on the part of the recalcitrant Republicans but because a majority of the Democrats found their greed for high duties on many commodities more impelling than their sense of loyalty to the unholy alliance into which they had entered solely for political advantage.

Had the Democrats been honest in their often-expressed dissatisfaction with the industrial rate increase in the bill they would have supported a move by one of their number—THOMAS of Oklahoma—to eliminate all advances in duties except those on agricultural products. Just 6 of the 39 Democratic Senators supported that proposition.

THE FINE ART OF EVASION

The Democratic Party delayed passage of the Republican tariff law for more than a year, intimidating business and keeping the country in a state of fear and uncertainty.

For the ensuing year they viciously and consistently hammered this creation in which they had played a vital part. Their attacks were all in generalities. They denounced and deplored, but were too canny to name a single rate they would reduce. Then they were put to the acid test by Republican leaders who publicly challenged Democratic Senators to specify the items they would reduce.

A silence comparable to that of the tomb ensued. Gentlemen of the opposition took to cover and few stood upon the order of their going.

LABORS OF THE MOUNTAIN—THE DEMOCRATIC BILL

Before they took to the refuge of silence Democratic leaders had solemnly promised to lower the "iniquitious" rates, if not to repeal the act altogether. Suddenly and unexpectedly, with the election of a Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, they were faced with the problem of making good. Consequently they brought out and passed what they called a tariff bill. It furnished conclusive evidence of the fraudulent character of the Democratic abuse of the Republican law as it did not propose to change a single rate. It was more than honest supporters of the Democratic Party could stomach. They denounced it as a "subterfuge and a sham."

This Democratic measure contained two vicious proposals. Under one the purely domestic question of tariff duties would be thrown into the maelstrom of world politics. Under the other, proposing reciprocal tariff agreements, the United States would be drawn into all the trade wars of Europe and Asia.

PACKING THE TAX BILL

But the crowning evidence of the duplicity of the Democratic Party is of even more recent date. It was only a few weeks ago that this party made the Budget-balancing tax bill a political picket fence upon which to hang tariff duties ranging from 16 per cent to 61 per cent on products of Democratic States.

There never has been such a shameless exhibition as this willful attempt by Democratic leaders of both Houses of Congress to deceive the American people as to their real views on protection while at the same time seizing every opportunity to snatch political favor by including tariff duties in the tax bill. The gentlemen who had denounced and deplored the "iniquitous" rates of the Hawley-Smoot Act used every devious method in their highly developed art of logrolling to obtain protection for oil, coal, copper, and lumber.

DEMOCRATIC CRITICISM OF DEMOCRATS

No word of mine can carry the force or so well depict the shame of the Democratic Party as do the remarks of the leaders of Democratic thought throughout the country. I shall not try to add to these statements. I would not attempt to gild the lily. I include unadorned the wisdom of some of the Nation's prominent Democratic spokesmen and writers.

Let me quote the sterling Democrat, Representative CRISP, of Georgia, who stated:

To-day I am seeing my party destroy itself. I am witnessing my party put on higher tariff rates than even the Republicans put on—putting on embargoes and then going out and criticizing the bill.

Add to this indictment the pronouncement of America's leading Democratic newspaper, the Baltimore Sun:

In the House the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee committed two outrages: First, they let the oil people write a tariff that they had been unable to get in a fair tariff fight; and second, they let them write it into a tax bill, where it had no more business than in an appropriation bill.

Walter Lippmann, former editor of the arch-Democratic New York World, adds this trenchant comment:

It makes ridiculous their whole case against the Republican tariff policy. * * * Once these tariffs are made law the country will laugh at their protests.

Claude G. Bowers, archangel of Democracy and keynoter at the Democratic National Convention of 1928, speaks as follows:

From a Democratic viewpoint, we have never seen anything quite so degrading and destructive as the exhibition of last Saturday.

JOHN E. RANKIN, Democrat, of Mississippi, sadly remarked:

These Democrats who are straying off and advocating tariffs on various and sundry commodities have been called "tariff hitch-hikers" by a certain gentleman at the other end of the Capitol. He said the hitch-hiker rides with a man without paying any of the expenses, burns up his gasoline, wears out his car, sometimes sandbags the owner and takes it away from him, and if he is injured in the slightest manner invariably sues him for damages.

One more illuminating quotation must be added because it is so completely and beautifully truthful. I quote that able Democrat, Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois:

Lower this tariff drastically? You [Republicans] will not do it, and we [Democrats] do not dare do it with conditions as they are * * *. We do not want the market flooded with the products of cheap labor in other countries.

THE ULTIMATE HYPOCRISY—THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

Nothing could be added to the foregoing record of the Democratic Party on the tariff more eminently fitting than the 1932 Democratic platform which, as an insult to the intelligence of the voter is peerless, and as a piece of arrant demagoguery is magnificant in its effrontery. It solemnly denounces the Hawley-Smoot Act, declares against high tariffs and specifically proposes a "competitive tariff for revenue."

The Falstaffian humor of this plank written by the disciples of Janus is apparent, but the United States is to-day in no mood for either low comedy or shameless deception.

SOLDIERS OF AMERICA

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at York, Pa., April 6, 1932, before Veterans of Foreign Wars:

It is my privilege this year to turn the thoughts of the American people toward George Washington on every available occasion.

Outwardly the reason for this is that we may pay to George Washington the endless honors that are due him and that have a special timeliness this year, because 1932 is the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

But beneath this year of celebration there is an inward and far deeper meaning. George Washington himself would spurn these honors we pay him as empty and worthless, without this deeper meaning of the words we utter in his praise.

The one way in which we can truly honor George Washington at all is to revive again those principles on which he founded our Government and our country and apply ourselves to a new effort in living up to them.

So it is that every other passing anniversary this year is a fit occasion for refreshing ourselves at the fount of Washington's patriotism. Every other memorable moment in our history has its attachment to him. For we would have had no such glorious history if we had not had Washington in the beginning.

This occasion to-day, April 6, is the anniversary of that day when our Nation was drawn into the recent World War.

It was the day when you who now look upward toward me turned your faces to America's enemies and prepared to save your country.

Could there be a closer link between this year and this day and that former day when George Washington made the same appeal for men to stand with him, facing an enemy of America and willing to suffer and die for the safety of their country?

If George Washington could stand here in my place, I believe the tears would well in his eyes, as they did sometimes when the loyalty of his brave men especially touched him.

The only difference he would see would be the difference between olive drab and the ancient buff and blue. Under the different uniforms he would see the same type of American, the same loyal patriot, the same lover of his country as the men who stayed with him from Boston to Yorktown and the victorious entry into New York on the heels of the British invaders.

If there is one thing about you that would touch George Washington more than the sameness of you veterans and his devoted Continentals, it would be your vast numbers.

When Washington lived and carried this Nation to victory on his own courage and character, nothing tried his courage and his patience more than the problem of raising enough men to fight to victory with him.

He never could collect from the little country that America then was, enough men to make his victories quick and decisive.

He was forced to drag along through eight years of struggle and toil and blood and discouragement. He had to lose bitter battles on Long Island, at the Brandywine, and Germantown. He and his nearly naked army had to suffer all the horrors of Valley Forge, and be content with little successes snatched here and there before there came at last that stirring situation at Yorktown that crowned with God's own gift of success the great Commander-in-Chief and his little army in which every man was a hero.

What a leap his heart would have given, to see millions of American patriots rush to arms a few years ago, where in his day he sighed in relief when he gained a few thousand more recruits to his ranks!

In 1776, America had a few thousand defenders. In 1917, she had millions to rise and dare a thousand deaths for her safety.

In 1776 war was fought with clumsy weapons. In 1917 the man who came to the defense of his country faced a war made tenfold more horrible by every device that science could invent for the maiming of human bodies and the taking of human lives. Yet millions were ready to meet these dangers. How Washington's heart would go out to you who formed that and other great American armies.

I am sure he would heartily agree with what I say here now—that American patriotism is not dead but lives as strong as of old.

All honor to the heroes who fought by Washington's side and marched with their bleeding feet through the snow wherever he ordered them to go. But I contend that love of country did not die and disappear with Washington's men in buff and blue. It lived and flamed again when America once more called to you, her sons of this later day, and placed her destiny in your keeping.

She clad you in different colors, but the hearts that beat beneath your uniforms ran with the same red blood of courage, willing to be shed, if need be, for the Nation that George Washington gave us to preserve forever.

You who fought these later battles in the cause of America's safety and in the name of liberty were really fighting for George Washington just as much as if he were to rally and command you.

So we are gathered here in singleness of spirit with the Father of the Land on soil made sacred by his very presence and rendered still more holy by our country's history.

About us as we meet here is a city that has grown with America's growth from struggling colonial days.

But it was here when our history was young and when George Washington himself was alive and already thinking of America's future.

Into this city a little more than a century and a half ago Washington rode on one of his constant travels about the country. He had taken his stepson, Jackie Custis, to New York to place him in King's College, now Columbia University.

After this happy and peaceful errand, and when he had turned back toward his beloved Mount Vernon, Washington came through Pennsylvania and stopped at York Town, as it then was called. That was in 1773, while America still was at peace, and nothing distracted Washington from his favorite pursuit of observing the quality of the land and dreaming of the prosperous future he foresaw for his fortunate countrymen.

Then came the struggle for independence, with its eight long years of doubt and toil and discouragement and suspense. The most powerful nation then on earth had sent its trained and disciplined armies here to keep us enslaved to their King.

During the darkest period in all that anxious time this city was for nearly a year the capital of the United States. I have said that history has made this sacred soil. Let me tell you why it is made so sacred.

It was here that the Continental Congress sat while George Washington and his army were going through the horrors of Valley Forge.

The powerful foe had driven the Commander in Chief to hide his little starving and freezing band in the hills and hollows of that camp which has been forever hallowed by their sufferings.

Before the same all-conquering foe, Congress had been forced to flee from Philadelphia and hold its sessions here.

Had Congress remained in Philadelphia every Member would have been made a prisoner and might have been hanged as a traitor to the British King. Over the head of George Washington himself hung the same possible fate. He, too, would have been hanged if any one of the many efforts to capture him had been successful.

We know what happened instead. Washington lived to triumph over his enemy and establish our land, while a patriot Congress held the struggling country together behind him.

But that glorious end of the struggle was far from visible in that winter of 1777 and 1778. On the contrary, it looked almost impossible for this impoverished people to conquer the powerful forces arrayed against them.

Here in this city, then a pioneer village, they thought and fought it out—George Washington watching his starving men at Valley Forge, and Congress sitting here and striving to raise the men and the money so sorely needed to win the war.

Into this town Washington sent his despairing and pleading letters from his camp of starvation and distress. Here he told Congress it must somehow feed and clothe and pay his suffering men. Here the heart and the soul of the infant Nation was tested as it never has been in all its history. And here American courage won.

So when I compare you patriot Americans of to-day with the heroes gathered about George Washington, I pay you the greatest compliment that human lips could frame. Now, let me add to the compliment by telling you how true it is, and how well deserved.

To you also came the call of service to country in the face of death and danger. To you it meant the same sacrifice that was paid by the patriots of 1777.

Let us never forget what it cost the men of Washington's army to fight at his side. They left their families in danger of want, sometimes in danger of hostile savages. They left their farms to suffer neglect and ruin.

Many of Washington's officers had been well-to-do men and lost their all in order to serve him. Love of country could rise to no greater heights than that.

But you, too, when you heard the call of your country, laid aside your occupations, your comfortable homes, and the loving embrace of your children, your wives, your loved ones.

You, too, had a menacing enemy to face. When America entered this recent war that struggle was at the stage of its Valley Forge. The foe appeared to be victorious, with a helpless world at its feet. The heart of humanity was stilled with fear. The fate of the world lay in America's hands, and America was unready and far away.

The only difference between that dark time and the anxious months that Washington had to endure in 1777 was that the danger in 1917 was more fearful, and the cost and the effort needed to meet it were greater still.

Not only that, Washington's men were stimulated to desperate courage from seeing the enemy before their very homes, on their own soil. This later call to American patriotism was to take millions of men thousands of miles to foreign soils, across seas as dangerous as the fields of battle.

This is the very day, 15 years ago, when many of you heard the call and prepared to answer it without a murmur.

First came the months of dreary training and drilling the army that had sprung to arms overnight. Washington had to wait three years to obtain a mere handful of recruits. Then a united Nation cheered you on, while you sailed the seas to prove that Americans fight for their high ideals no matter where the threat may rise against them.

The hottest fires of war ever kindled waited to test American courage, American spirit, American endurance, and the will to win.

In hardly more than a year from the moment you Americans planted your feet on soil reddened and torn by three years of fire and slaughter, the waves of destruction had been beaten back, the thunder of thousands of mighty guns had been stilled, and once again American might and courage had rendered safe the cause of liberty and the rights of mankind.

That glorious rounded record you bring here to-day, on the anniversary of the day when most of you began that record. Here you lay it at the feet of George Washington on the very ground he once trod, on the very spot where his impassioned appeals for help were heard.

You have only his memory to salute to-day. The hand of death and a century and a half of change have placed an impenetrable curtain over the great events that occurred when he was passing this way. Not all the passionate love we bear him can reach his ears.

But I believe—I know—his spirit is with us here. You who have met here can only mutely lay before him this record of yours for his equally mute approval. But if some miracle would let us break the grand and solemn silence that reigns where George Washington sleeps—if we could hear his beloved voice once more—I believe we would hear him say:

"Well done, my patriot Americans. The fire that stirred your fathers to high deeds for a high cause lives on in you. In you the same soul that made this country flames on to keep it safe. Raise your sons to receive my blessing, even as I give it in pride to you."

Yes; I believe the great American we honor this year would have more than approval of your deeds, your sacrifices, the risks you ran, and the losses you have taken. He would feel every pride in you.

In all the years since Valley Forge not one thing has lessened the courage of this country or the constancy of its people. On America's roll of honor, which began early and will never end, you, too, have placed your names in letters that will blaze with the brightest that are there.

But just as George Washington fought and won a war only to issue from it a friend and counsellor of peace, so I believe that you also, who know battle from having faced its perils, are with him in a hatred of its waste and sacrifice of lives.

Washington himself proved what a sublime thing it is to offer one's very life for country; but what a still greater thing it is to live for country. Nobler even than dying for country, is achieving for one's country and adding to its progress.

In that George Washington shone most sublimely of all. And it is along the paths of peace that we need most of all to follow him now.

It may be that not even yet has Almighty God, in His wisdom, lifted the curse of war from the souls of men. It may be that not yet may we hope to have seen the last of carnage and bloodshed. But we do know that mankind has lived up to one of Washington's principles of honor—that only injustice, only the invasion of fundamental human rights, can justify the argument of battle. No longer will the opinion of humanity permit nations to wage wars for mere love of conquest. And George Washington looked forward to a day when enlightened mankind shall have found a way to rule out even the justifiable causes of war.

George Washington not only foresaw that day, he labored to bring it about. As a soldier he fought to win. As President of the United States he strove for peace.

During his administration this country was under a thousand temptations to enter into the raging disputes of other nations. George Washington underwent some of the bitterest abuse ever heaped on a public officer of this country in his steadfast and resolute efforts to keep us neutral and aloof. When passions had cooled, when reason returned to men's minds it was seen that in his labors for peace George Washington had but added to his greatness.

To-day the world is slowly striving toward a goal that appeared before the vision of George Washington even before the Constitution of the United States was framed and signed. He then expressed a belief in a permanent future world peace, and he stated this belief in a letter to a great French warrior—Lafayette—who had fought with him throughout the Revolution and who knew war as it was known to Washington himself.

In that expression he looked forward to a time when "mankind may be connected like one great family in fraternal ties." He told Lafayette that even then the world was growing less barbarous. The nations were becoming more humanized. The causes for hostility were daily diminishing. And he believed the period was not remote when a free and liberal commerce would take the place of the horrors and devastations of war.

The same man who stated these beliefs could still insist that the best way to avoid war was to be amply prepared for war. The same man who hoped for a future world peace could still insist that the only satisfactory peace was "peace with justice and honor." But he nevertheless hoped and believed that humanity was moving upward toward those principles of international honor and harmony which would one day make war impossible.

Toward that goal George Washington himself strove with all his counsels and teachings, and by his own great example.

So, if it is noble to live for one's country and to strive for our Nation's progress, it is noblest and best to follow George Washington's guidance in this exalted purpose.

We could not better honor George Washington, not only this year but in all years to come, than by living for our country in the George Washington way—by living up to his precepts—by "cultivating peace with harmony"; by "observing good faith and justice toward all nations," just as he has urged us in that greatest state paper ever composed by the hand of man, the Farewell Address.

Let us honor George Washington this year by dedicating ourselves to these counsels as he has left. We could not begin this rededication at a better time than during this year we have set aside to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. We could not select a more appropriate day than this fifteenth anniversary of the entrance of our country into the Great War for the preservation of world liberty.

In that spirit and with that high purpose I invite you who have been warriors in the George Washington spirit to join with our country this year in its tribute to this great preacher of peace with honor.

You will be like Washington's own veterans, saluting your old commander. You will be taking a solemn vow for the continued safety of your country—by war only in the last resort, and all the rest of the time through the channels of peace. And so you will be adding a deep and solemn note to the reverence and the affection we pour forth this year to one so well described as "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

AN APPRECIATION

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me February 23, 1932:

The great celebration of the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington has been formally opened, and from now on interest in the observance of this historic event will gather momentum until its climax and the end of the celebration, on Thanksgiving Day of this year.

Yesterday witnessed the opening of these nation-wide—I should say world-wide—plans which have been maturing for the past two years. We of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, of which I have the honor to be associate director, are proud of the overwhelming response of the people of the United States to the work which we have been doing. We are gratified beyond all measure of expression at the cooperation, the sympathetic helpfulness, and the deep patriotic feeling that have been exemplified in every part of our beloved land.

I speak from the heart when I say that all of us who have been concerned in this momentous work are deeply touched at the appreciation which has been given to our humble efforts, and we are inspired by the obvious fact that the people of the United States everywhere have rallied to the spirit and purpose of this occasion beyond anything that could have been anticipated.

The events of the past two years have occupied our minds, our hearts, and our hands beyond any similar work that was ever undertaken. The beginning of this celebration yesterday was marked by observance in thousands of towns and cities throughout the Nation and in millions of homes and schools and churches. From one end of the country to the other, in our insular possessions, in foreign lands, wherever Americans reside there has been exhibited an interest and a whole-hearted sentiment of the true American spirit which should hearten every real American living under the protection of our flag.

The nations of the world joined with us yesterday in paying homage to our great Washington. In practically all foreign countries radio broadcasts were made by heads of government, statesmen, and patriots, so that the name of Washington resounded throughout the earth.

The celebration in the National Capital naturally was the center of immediate interest, because here the Government itself in the most formal, dignified, and magnificent way paid the tribute to Washington with solemn and beautiful ceremony.

The address of the President of the United States and the singing of America by a grand chorus of the entire Nation were carried by the miracle of radio to every part of the world. Yesterday the man who still is and ever will be to us the Father of Our Country reached the hearts of his people as never before. Today the press of the world tells us how the hearts of humanity responded.

To-day it is my proud privilege, through the courtesy of this great broadcasting system, to thank the 120,000,000 Americans who responded so magnificently to this call of a great man to a great occasion.

On behalf of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission I tender the thanks of this Government to our people everywhere and to those across the seas for their interest and their help in this fitting testimonial to the memory of our greatest American.

I can hardly realize what has come to pass. The celebration has begun in a manner that overwhelms me. It is not only the greatest event of its kind ever held in the history of the world, but it is impossible now to conceive how anything could have been added to this mighty tribute of the people of all countries. The words I speak are hopelessly inadequate to express what I, an American citizen, and lover of George Washington, would like to convey to my fellow Americans.

No precedent guided us, for no such celebration was ever attempted by any nation at any time. We set to work with energy and enthusiasm which have not abated during all these months and years of effort.

We were sustained by an unfaltering confidence that Americans were eager to participate in this form of tribute. That confidence grew with the passing of time and with the thousands upon thousands of letters that came to the commission from all over the world and especially all over our own country. We were inspired with new confidence, new faith, and new energy. I may say truthfully that I do not believe any organization of the Government, in time of war or peace, has ever given such unstinted service, loyalty, and talent as have those who have aided me in the conduct of this mighty enterprise. On behalf of Americans everywhere I want to express my appreciation of this service which is as truly a tribute to Washington as any ceremony or any material monument.

What we witnessed here in the National Capital yesterday was an awakening that gives encouragement to all of patriotic hearts and minds.

When the President of the United States stood in the National Capitol and delivered his wonderful tribute to the memory of George Washington, I felt a thrill I can not describe. It was what we had worked for, planned for, hoped for, all these years. It was the greatest historical celebration in the life of our country and not at least for another hundred years will there be anything like it. Our dream was realized, our hopes fulfilled, and I know that George Washington received the tribute that he would have liked to receive, because it was not in the form of a new monument or material evidence of our growth, but was an expression from the hearts and minds of his people—the people of the United States.

I say this with the pride of an American. I say it with a heart full of gratitude to those who have joined with us in the planning of this great celebration. We Americans have always loved George Washington, but to-day we love him with a new revelation of understanding. We love him because we know more about him, and knowing more about him we realize the mighty stature of the man.

What the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission needed to do was to awaken the love of our people to this new understanding of Washington. It was a mighty task and we are proud to feel that with the support of the people themselves the task has been well done.

Eight years ago far-sighted men in Congress had a vision of just what we witnessed yesterday and took steps to prepare for it.

The program which was launched was broad and comprehensive. It ramified to every corner of the earth and reached every stratum of humanity. When we began our work George Washington was something of a myth—to many a cold, impersonal figure of history, remote and almost unknown. To-day there is hardly a man, woman, or child in this land of ours but knows a great deal about George Washington. They know something of his mighty character, they know of his services, his sacrifices, his victories, and his triumphs of statesmanship. But more than that, they know of George Washington as the man. They feel a different sentiment toward him, a nearness, an understanding, a personal love.

From the least known of Americans, George Washington has become one of the best known. We have succeeded in large measure at least, in making him familiar to Americans for what he really was—a simple farmer, like millions of other American farmers—a business man, like many other American business men—a friend worshiped by troops of friends, a father to all the children he knew, a devoted husband, a mighty conqueror without the glamor of ambition, a statesman without selfishness—the ideal American.

I believe that if this celebration had served no other purpose than in making George Washington understood and loved it would have been worth all the planning and all the effort.

So I have reason not only to thank the American people for their cooperation but to congratulate them from the depths of my heart for the long, earnest, self-giving efforts they themselves have put forth to make this memorial to George Washington what it should be.

During these two years of active preparation 60,000,000 people—half the population of the United States—with half a million committees to lead them, have found the time, the willingness, and the initiative to plan the great tribute which opened in the National Capital yesterday and in cities, towns, and hamlets all over our beloved land.

But it is the 35,000,000 young Americans in our schools and colleges who have touched my heart most profoundly. It was the patriotism of these future generations of American citizens that we wished to awaken first of all to a response in love of country that has stirred me deeply.

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has found it almost impossible to meet the demands for school studies of Washington. We have, however, placed his picture in every one of the 850,000 schoolrooms of the country. We have supplied these schools with literature of all kinds, touching every phase of the life of George Washington. These young people have enrolled themselves with the same enthusiasm in the contests we have arranged through the year for excellence in essay, declamation, and oratory on the subject of George Washington and the Americanism he lived and taught.

Nothing could have pleased and touched George Washington himself so much as this overwhelming tribute of affection from these young Americans of to-day. Childless himself, he loved all the children that he could draw near him. Yesterday the children of a later America paid him the same homage of love in song, in parades, in every form of exercise.

This tribute from those who will love Washington all their lives and strive to be like him was one of the finest touches to the whole celebration, and I am proud to have had a hand in bringing about a stirring of hearts so deep, so fine, and so patriotic.

No greater distinction or self-satisfaction could come to any man, woman, or child than to have had a part in this inspiring work.

Throughout the months to come there will be thousands upon thousands of celebrations of all kinds throughout our country. For the most part these will be simple, inexpensive forms of tribute—the kind George Washington himself would most like. I ask the people everywhere, and especially the boys and girls, to become active in these celebrations, for everyone will have his opportunity.

Let us upon all appropriate occasions find ways of joining in these manifestations of honor to the great American, for in honoring George Washington we honor ourselves; in teaching George Washington we are doing the most important work in the preservation of our common country.

COLONIAL GARDENS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me March 17, 1932:

I am asked, as associate director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, to launch on this occasion a campaign which is one of the most beautiful and touching honors we can render to George Washington during this year, when the Nation and the world commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

I am asking all those who hear me to plant flowers to the memory of George Washington.

And so that this loving tribute, this burst of color from the very earth, shall not be for this year only, I am asking that you plant those perennial flowers that bud and bloom year after year for as long as they live.

Nothing could be more appropriate than such a tribute. George Washington himself loved scenes of beauty. Time and again in his letters and in his diaries he tells of pausing, even in the midst of his gravest military anxieties, to admire the beauty of some view or some locality.

Washington was a gardener himself—a landscape gardener of the first rank in his day. If he was not the first man to beautify his home and the grounds about it, he was a leader in such pleasing work in a State that was famous even in his day for the splendor of its great and beautiful estates.

If you have visited Mount Vernon, or if you plan and hope to visit Mount Vernon, you will have seen there in every tree and shrub and plant the magic touch of his hand, creating its serene and peaceful beauty.

Many of the trees that he planted with his own hand are still there, each placed where he knew it would add its cool green color and graceful form to the loveliness of the rest.

You will see at Mount Vernon the garden designed and laid out by Washington. There is the mystic maze it amused him to plan; the walks lined with their boxwood; the ivy draping fences and walls in a curtain of velvet green.

You will see there some of the very flowers he loved to grow—the old and simple blossoms that were as honest and true and unpretentious as he was himself.

Mount Vernon was beautiful because the soul of George Washington was beautiful. It is beautiful to-day because he coaxed from the arms of nature, the sweetness and charm to match the sweetness and charm of his own soul.

We do not all possess broad lawns and rolling acres, and the room for rows of blushing flowers. But every patriotic American can plant some floral tribute to George Washington this year, if it is only a geranium pot that he places in the sunshine at his window.

It will be an offering of beauty to a lover of beauty, in a language that speaks across all boundaries of time and beyond the grave itself. It will be the spirit of America to-day, exchanging greetings with the spirit of Washington himself, as if differences in time had disappeared and the two spirits were face to face.

The planting of flowers in Washington's name this year will be like covering the fair face of our land with visible symbols of the beauty of Washington's own character and life.

In this growing of lovely things, this covering of the land with many colors, I see one more instance proving that Washington's hand is still lifted in blessing over the hearts of our people and the welfare of our country.

In this age of universal mechanism, and in the rush of our material pursuits, we need, as never before, to restore beauty to our lives. We have covered our land with factories and have covered the sky with the smoke of industry. We live in a day of tremendous accomplishment. In all this there is a beauty of achievement and enrichment of human life. George Washington would approve all this. Indeed, he largely foresaw it and planned it.

But always he loved to retire to his beloved and lovely Mount Vernon—to the shade of its trees, to the peace of its rolling fields, to strolls through its flowery gardens. And he bids us do the same to-day.

This broad continent has room for flowers, as it has for factories. Our lives have room for roses and violets as well as for material desires and business aims. We need to give our busy land its needed decoration, with the gifts that nature has placed at our hands, if only we use them.

In so doing we are only turning back to the ways of George Washington, who made himself one of the most prosperous men in America and still found time to make his home a place to gladden his eye and to rest his soul.

So I hope that every patriotic American who hears me will cooperate in this movement to plant flowers in honor of George Washington, and will plant as many beautiful things as he possibly can this bicentennial year. Plant a garden, if you can; if not, only a circle of posies in your dooryard will be a fine tribute to pay to Washington. It will be doing something fine for your country, and it will be doing something fine for yourself.

We of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission want America to be one great garden this year and for all years to come. We want to see unlovely yards and lots veiled in the petals of buds and flowers. We want all America to be more like George Washington's Mount Vernon.

But to attain this fine spiritual end practical means are necessary. So I am glad to say to all good Americans who are stirred to go forth with spade and trowel that we of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission are working to help you with practical advice and suggestion.

We have working with us the United States Department of Agriculture, American Society of Landscape Architects, the garden clubs of America, the agricultural colleges, and many other floral organizations. The bicentennial committees and commissions of all the States stand ready to do everything possible in promoting this planting of flowers in Washington's honor.

Experts will tell you of all the varieties of plants and flowers that were loved by Washington or were familiar in his time. They will tell you how to utilize plots of land, how to prepare the soil, how to watch the growth of what you plant, and how to make it a lasting and endless growth; a permanent addition to the loveliness of our land.

Amateur gardeners have only to apply to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, or to the Department of Agriculture, and success is assured them. And I can assure them of something else.

I can assure them of a satisfaction in knowing that they are doing something for George Washington in making their America a happier and more beautiful place in which to live.

THE DEMANDS FOR PLEDGES FROM CANDIDATES FOR CONGRESS FROM MILITARY AND NAVAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the War Department appropriation bill has just been signed by the President. It carries an appropriation of $289,500,024 for strictly military activities. This is a decrease of $49,448,593.32 in comparison with the same appropriation for the previous year. This decrease in no way affected the strength of the Army, the enlisted and commissioned personnel remaining the same. It affects supplies, and so forth. An effort was made to reduce the number of officers. The House bill provided for 10,000 officers rather than 12,000, but the Senate restored the present number and insisted for weeks upon its amendment, the House finally being required to recede.

Organized military groups throughout the country brought pressure to bear upon Members of Congress to retain the 12,000 officers. The Senate would not even agree to 11,000, but insisted upon the present quota.

The Reserve Officers' Association, the National Guard Association, and organizations representing the civilian military training camps and other military units, including colleges and universities, made themselves heard while the bill was under consideration. The Congress in the end bowed to their demands.

I have had considerable correspondence with these organizations. Outstanding among the organizations that I have heard from is the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States and the Naval Reserves. Recently the Army reserve organization wrote me a letter, signed by the president of the St. Louis chapter, an excellent gentleman, Capt. William R. Gentry, jr. The letter clearly indicates to me that the organization will at least present to its members the result of a questionnaire showing the views of candidates for Congress on our national defense. Its purpose no doubt will be to defeat those who are not willing to go on record to support the present activities and personnel of the Army. As I said, Captain Gentry is an outstanding gentleman; he understands my position, knows that I will vote as I feel the best interests of the country demand; but when the questionnaire goes out, and I am listed as refusing to pledge my vote prior to election, I will not fare so well at the hands of other members of the organization. The correspondence is clear and speaks for itself.

I was told in the letter that the St. Louis chapter of the Reserve Officers' Association would shortly circularize the 3,500 reserve officers in Missouri and the 4,500 members of the Missouri National Guard and let these 8,000 civilian soldiers know how the 97 candidates for Congress in Missouri and the Senate candidates stand on matters of national defense. This, of course, will be done without any cost whatever to any of the candidates, they stated.

I was advised the Regular Army at the present time consists of 12,000 officers and 118,000 enlisted men; our second line of defense, the National Guard, is composed of 190,000 citizens who drill one night a week at Government expense and go to summer camps for two weeks, also at Government expense; that the Officers' Reserve Corps is maintained to furnish officers for the draft, should a situation arise which could not be handled by the Regular Army and the National Guard; that at the present time the Officers' Reserve contains 110,000 officers, and some 25,000 go to camp at Government expense for two weeks each year; that the Government also maintains military units at various State colleges and universities for the military training of students, and in this way gets some 7,500 new reserve officers each year. In addition, the letter stated some 37,000 young men receive a month's military instruction each year at the civilian military training camps.

Then they advanced the information that the total cost of the military activities of the Army is somewhat under $280,000,000 a year, and of that money, some $31,000,000 goes to the National Guard, approximately $6,500,000 to the Officers' Reserve Corps, about $4,000,000 to the military units at the schools and colleges, and about $2,500,000 for the civilian military training camps. Captain Gentry then said it is needless for him to point out to me that substantial reductions can be made in the operating cost of the Army by the elimination of a large number of military posts which were once valuable in the Indian fighting days, but no longer have any value from a strategic standpoint; that at the present time there are over 200 posts and stations inside the United States; that a large number of the interior posts could be completely dismantled and abandoned, and the forces now garrisoning these posts could be advantageously moved to our borders and coast lines, where they could be trained much more efficiently and at the same time substantial economies could be effected without reduction in personnel.

He told me they believe that they should hold on to our present system of national defense until such time as other nations make substantial reductions in their own armaments and come down to a basis more nearly equal with ours. Then he said their bulletin, which will go out about the middle of July, will be based on nonpartisan lines, and will put the 97 candidates in three classifications as follows: First, those who are opposed to any further reductions at the present time; second, those who do not care to commit themselves; and, third, those who favor further reduction. He then said he would be glad if I will let him know at my convenience in what classification I desired my name to be placed. He also said if I had military experience he would be glad to make a note of it in the bulletin. To that letter I replied as follows:

DEAR CAPTAIN GENTRY: Your letter received. Speaking frankly, I doubt very much the wisdom of the Reserve Officers' Association seeking expressions from candidates for Congress on the eve of a primary for the purpose of circularizing your membership and advising them of the stand of the candidates on matters of national defense.

While I have no objection to my views being known on any important question, still a yes or no answer to your questions without some explanation would be unfair to those who understand the situation.

The weak-kneed candidates will answer your questions in the affirmative. This is always the policy of men of that class. As your poll is solely for political purposes—I do not say partisan political purposes—the answer of the candidate will be based upon his desire for votes. There is a danger in electing men to office who will answer a questionnaire as the writer of the questionnaire would like to have the candidate answer.

You enumerate the activities of the Army, especially as to training of civilians, members of the Organized Reserves, National Guard, and citizens military training camps, and make mention of the Government maintaining units at various State colleges and universities. Concluding, you express your opinion that our present system should be maintained until such time as other nations make substantial reductions in their own armaments.

No patriotic American is in favor of reducing our Army or its activities to the point where it will weaken our national defense. You say we are spending $280,000,000 a year on our military activities. I insist that for a much less sum we can maintain our present standard of efficiency if not improve it 25 per cent by proper administration. I strongly favor a department of national defense headed by 1 Cabinet officer with 3 assistant secretaries, 1 for the Army, 1 for the Navy, and 1 for a united Air Corps. The enactment of such legislation with the proper official at its head would save this country within a few years at least $100,000,000 per year, and the country would have a better and more efficient Army and Navy.

Scores of similar activities in the Army and Navy could be grouped. As a crude example, let us start at the bottom. Go to the old customhouse in St. Louis and you will find a recruiting station for the Army, one for the Navy, and one for the Marine Corps. Can any sane individual say if we had one recruiting station for the three branches of our national defense that it would interfere with its efficiency? I could go right along until I reach the office of the Secretaries and show a duplication of work by the Army and Navy that could be properly coordinated at a great saving.

Major generals and admirals down to the second lieutenants and ensigns are assigned to duty in Washington by the hundreds, doing nothing but clerical work, when they should be on active duty with the troops or on ships and at shore stations. True, it is absolutely necessary to have some of the officers in Washington, but not in the number they are now assigned. Properly trained civilians could do the work now performed by the great majority of the officers and at salaries one-third of that being paid the commissioned personnel.

If you could take a trip through the offices of the Army and Navy with me and see the nature of the work that many of the officers perform, you would agree with my view.

The committee of which I am chairman held hearings for weeks on the Army and Navy consolidation bill, and on the final vote on reporting the bill it was defeated by a very small majority. Had the vote been taken before the hearings it would have been reported by no less than 6 majority out of 21 votes, but during the hearings the powerful Army and Navy lobby, with its allied military and naval civilian organizations, brought such pressure to bear that man after man fearing political reprisal changed his attitude.

The bill was then included in the economy bill by the Economy Committee, of which I was a member. On a record vote it was defeated by 19 votes. A change of 10 votes will pass that bill in the next Congress whether I am a Member or not. The President openly opposed the bill, and that is all that prevented its passage.

I firmly believe that it will be to the best interests of the country, to the Officers' Reserve Corps, National Guard, Naval Reserves, etc., to consolidate the Army and Navy, for I am confident with the right man at the head of a department of national defense it will make for a much better Army and Navy as well as result in a great savings to the taxpayers of this country.

Concluding let me say even if it would mean my renomination and election I would refuse to pledge myself now to vote in the next session of Congress (the appropriation bills for 1934 will be passed in December next by the present Members of Congress and not those to be elected in November) for the activities you enumerate in your communication. I will meet that situation when it confronts me, and at that time will consider the condition of the Treasury, as well as the welfare of our country, for which I have as much love as any member of the Army and Navy.
